THE CHILD'S CORNER.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

Death of a Sunday School Scholar.

Died of Anx. at Black Hawk, Carroll Co., Miss., Oct. 28th, 1866, William M. Marshall, son of John and Virginia Marshall, and grandson of our venerable father in the ministry, J. I. E. Byrd, aged 13 years 11 months 26 days. He was a regular attendant at our Sabbath school, and well versed in the Holy Scriptures for one of his age; often gave a sermon with great earnestness, and his instruction from the lips of his father as though he thought there was no time to lose; how little did we then think that Willie would be so soon taken from our little land. During an illness of eighteen days, he exhibited a manly and christian-like patience. After suffering intensely, with cheerfulness he would say, "I am willing to die if it is God's will," when his disease assumed an alarming form, he said to his father, "I know this change is for the worse, and I am going to die, but I am not afraid to die, I know I shall go to a better country, than this; I know God will take me." A few moments before he breathed his last, he called for his mother, (who was in an adjoining room attending his little brother, who was very sick of the same disease,) saying he wished to talk with her; but when she came in the room he could but gasp one word at a time, and said "you can't talk to me much now, mother," which was with difficulty spoken. In a moment or two he ceased to breathe with a countenance as pleasant as an infant sleeping. During his illness he was visited frequently by brother Newsum, preacher in charge, who spoke to him freely of the probability of his being taken away; he spoke with calmness and confidence, saying he had trusted God all along. At his request Bro. Newsum prayed with him, singing by his own selection the hymn, "Jesus, lover of my soul," and "How happy are they who their Saviour obey." Thus he passed away a good boy, one that was ever kind and affectionate to all, and almost idolized by parents. He is missed in our Sabbath school, his seat is vacant in the family circle. A brother and sister mourn his loss, but may they with parents and relatives so live that they shall meet in the air, the immortal glory where parting is forever unknown. A Friend.

How Jesus Comes.

One evening the children in Falk's Rectory at Walnut sat down to supper. When one of the boys had said the prayer, "Come, Lord Jesus, be our guest, and bless what thou hast provided," the little fellow looked up and said—
"Do tell me why the Lord Jesus never comes? We ask him every day to sit with us, and he never comes."
"Dear child," only believe, and you may be sure he will come, for he does not despise our invitation."
"I shall see him a seat," said the little fellow, and just then there was a knock at the door.
A poor frozen apprentice entered, begging a night's lodging. He was made welcome, the child stood ready for him; every child wanted him to have his plate; and one was lamenting that his bed was too small for the stranger, who was just touched by such uncommon attentions. The little one had been thinking here all this time.
"Jesus could not come, and so he sent this man to his place—is that it?"
"Yes, dear child, that is just it. Every piece of bread, and every drink of water that we give to the poor or the sick, or the prisoners, for Jesus' sake, we give to Him."
"As much as you have done it unto him—of these my brethren, you have done it unto me."
The children sang a hymn of the love of God to their guest before they parted for the night, and neither he nor they were likely to forget the simple Bible comment—
"Praying and Working."

Tell Your Mother.

I wonder how many girls tell their mother everything? Not those "young ladies" who, going to and from school, smile, bow, and exchange notes and carter de visite with young men who make fun of you and your parents, speaking in a way that would make your cheeks burn with shame, if you heard it. All this, most incredulous and reckless young ladies, they will do, although they gaze at your fresh young face admiringly, and send or give you charming vases or bouquets. No matter "what other girls may do," don't you do it. School girls flirtations may seem disastrous, as many a foolish and wretched young girl could tell you. You are young, and your heart is in a great need of woman's love. But there is a time for everything. Don't let the bloom and freshness of your face be brushed off in silly flirtations. Remember yourself truly intelligent. And above all, tell your mother everything. "Tell" in your decision, do not let her look on her. It would do you no harm to look and see. Never be ashamed to tell her who should be your best friend and confidant, all you think and feel. It is very strange that so many young girls will tell every person but "mother," that which is most important she should know. It is very sad that the most devoted persons should know more about her fair young daughter than she herself—Funny Fern.

A YOUNG LADY'S ADVENTURE WITH A PRATING LUNATIC.—The English are divided into two compartments. A gentleman, traveling alone in one of these, was murdered a few months since, as our readers will remember. A young lady recently saved her life only by her presence of mind, as will be seen by the following account:

At Hanwell, recently, a young lady was put into a train alone to go to London. As the train was on the point of starting, a gentleman rushed up and got in. Shortly after the train had started, the gentleman jumped up and exclaimed—"this carriage is too heavy, it must be lighted," and straightway his carpet bag disappeared out of the window. He sits still a few minutes, when he begins again, and this time his coat and waistcoat follow his bag. After a little while he said—"Let us pray for our kindred, the poor girl, only seven: ten, too frightened to do any thing but obey. When this was done, they prayed for the Duke of York, and then for another—in fact through the whole string of dukes; then they sit down, the young lady frightened out of her wits.

After a few minutes he begins again—"It won't do; I can't stand it; the train is too heavy, either you or I must get out; I don't want to, so you must get out." The girl, in despair, says—"But we have not prayed for the Duke of Northumberland."

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

WEEKLY REVIEW.

The general market has exhibited a fair degree of animation, since the issue of our last publication. Sugar and Molasses have been active at higher prices, and the movement in Western Produce has disclosed its usual vitality, attended with a better feeling in the article of pork; while operations in our leading staple have evinced considerable animation, and factors under the favorable influence of an advance in Liverpool, have succeeded in realizing enhanced rates, the market closing on Monday, with a strong upward tendency.

COTTON.—On Monday in consequence of the favorable tone of the news from Liverpool, the market opened unusually active, buyers came forward freely, at a price disclosing a net improvement of 14 per cent, the market closing with a tendency decidedly upward.

TOBACCO.—The market is very firm, and quotations as follows:

Dr. Clark says, "This is certainly the most difficult verse in the New Testament. Now, I think, by following the plan of argument, as stated by Dr. Clark himself, many, if not all the difficulties, will be removed. He says, the Apostle first proves the resurrection of Christ, by Scripture from verse 1 to v. 4—then he proves it by eye witnesses, from verse 5th to v. 9. Then, secondly, he proves it by showing the absurdity of the contrary doctrine. He will follow the Apostle in his second argument of arguing the question; namely, if dead rise not, then is not Christ raised and if Christ be not risen, his body is in the tomb—is a dead body—and if he be so, then is our preaching vain, your faith is also vain. Ye are in your sins. We are also who use these for food. —He also quotes Luke

Reading, we would next remark, is not a certain road to intellectual power—for learning is the sure road to knowledge, and knowledge is a grand clew of power. Intellectual teaches a wise man is stronger; a man of knowledge increase strength. Though thirty centuries have rolled away since the writing of this inspired aphorism, it has lost none of its truthfulness. The history of individuals and of nations has a thousand times and more illustrated the power of knowledge. Archimedes, the Sicilian Mathematician, by his superior skill, with the power of his well directed arm, defied the might of the world renowned legions of Rome. The great marauder of mankind have ever been governed by the intelligent few, who have in their hands the reins of power. The intelligent p-not, will you not rend the chain which so tenuously binds you to inevitable ruin?

Think of the great responsibilities resting upon you in this day of national trial.
Where are your ambitious schemes, your high hopes? Lead your efforts to lift this mangle of gloom from the land of your nativity. Turn yourself loose from all "club friends," be a man, a hero in the strife. To whom else are we to look ward, the "grim monster," woe's fit death, and the veterans whose heads are frosted over, are filled out by one? Methinks if angels e'en weep, the whole earth would be deluged with their tears!—Then my friends, my countrymen, once again I entreat you, throw off the yoke, enter a better cause, rescue your friend and country to happiness, secure it yourself, and gain inheritance at "God's right hand."

Bro. L. G. Mitchell said he could add but little to this already lengthy discussion. He was the second oldest member on the floor. He favored the resolution, and hoped the convention would be called.

Bro. W. G. Barnett said he was in favor of the convention, but objected to that clause which gave it full power over the constitution. He therefore moved that the resolution be passed by striking out that clause.

This motion was carried, and the resolution as finally passed is as follows:

Resolved, That this conference join our sister annual conferences in the call of a general convention to convene at Montgomery, Ala., on the first Tuesday in May, 1867, and that we elect two ministers and two laymen delegates to said convention.

crease brings with it an increased capacity for study. The mind and body are refreshed, and when the holidays are over, the teachers and pupils return to their duties with clear heads and strong nerves. In this way the Germans acquire those robust constitutions which are the admiration of the world; and among our Teutonic citizens we find the best civil engineers, draughtsmen, chemists, botanists, and geologists to develop the resources of our country.—From J. Ross Browne's new book, "An American Family in Germany."

brother-in-law. Mr. Wesley was to be so kindly dealt with, that he was not to be afraid of him. Mr. Wesley, on one of his visits to our dear friend, Mr. Orme, observed, "My dear brother, a dinner was over, my little brother was sleeping around the table and taking up every thing that slipped what remained. My dear brother said to Mr. Wesley, said he feared he was not on would be too fond of wine. Mr. Wesley, in his familiar way, said, 'Nelly, if you will permit me, I will care him of this propensity.' She replied that she should be very glad. Wesley called my little brother to him and asked him if he liked wine. He said, 'I do, very much.' Wesley gave him a glass of wine, and a second, and a third, which increased him to caper about; he then turned away and became very sick, which rather alarmed my mother; but Wesley told her not to fear. He then asked my brother

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

COME AND GONE.

The little moonbeams on the drifted snow
Shine cold and pale, and blue
While through the window pane the gale
Glow
On the red oak's trunk and gray rock's brown
A roddy hue.

The red ray and the blue, distinct and fair,
Like happy groom and bride,
With snow green, and emerald orange, glare,
Gilding the faded from branches bare.

The Christmas eve came from the distant town
A pale and hard-frozen glow
Will to his heart's mother have been down,
And stretch his poor annual transport—down

The festive joy.
The cottage fire, hatched on his knee
The Father watchful calm; Till Edward came, no solemn prayer he;
Till Edward came, the text he cannot see.

And comes he not? Yes, from the wind-swept hill.
The cottage fire he sees;
While of the past Remembrance drinks her fill O'er childhood's flowers and the unfaded smile.

Shine through green trees.
In thought his wayward fancy to him here
The green tree's addition call—
In thought, he meets his mother at the door—
In thought, he hears his father's old and poor.

His sister he tells, who died when he
The father, far away, wept on Her last and better, "I'll be with you soon,
For Edward yet again—no, he will be Her playmate more.

Home! Home! I hold the cottage of the poor,
That heard the green tree's call.
And Mother meets him at the open door
With silent, faded, and Father, old and poor.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

WEEKLY REVIEW.

Since the date of our last publication the general market has exhibited less activity, although several of the leading articles have undergone material alteration. Sugar and Molasses have been in demand at higher prices, and the movement in Western Produce has disclosed considerable vitality, attended with an advance in corn and a less buoyant feeling in Flour and Pork; while operations in our leading staple have been less liberal, and although unfavorable advice has been received from Liverpool, still the improved tone which has characterized the movement in gold and exchange has enabled holders to sustain the market in a satisfactory position.

COTTON—In our last review we observed that after a limited advance on Friday, the market closed quiet, but firm, since which the movement has been quite restricted, although rates have continued unchanged, with the exception of Ordinary and Good Ordinary, which, in consequence of their extreme scarcity, have commanded enhanced rates. On Saturday there was a limited enquiry, the majority of buyers being unwilling to operate unless at concessions, to which factors steadily refused to submit. The receipt proper for the past four days comprise 12,751 bales, against 14,343 during the corresponding period last week, showing a decrease of 1592 bales.

Low..... 25. 26 27
Ordinary..... 28. 29 30
Good Ordinary..... 30. 31 32
Low Middling..... 32. 33 34
Middling..... 34. 35 36

TOBACCO—Several buyers on foreign account have been looking around but the sales have been small. The receipts of this crop are light and all descriptions sell readily. The stock on hand of old small and the desirable descriptions are selling well. The market is very firm, and we quote as follows:

Light..... 23. 24 25
Low..... 25. 26 27
Ordinary..... 28. 29 30
Good Ordinary..... 30. 31 32
Low Middling..... 32. 33 34

SUGAR—Has been in good demand. The sales on Saturday and Monday embraced 6000 hbls, at 7 1/2 to 8 1/2 cts for inferior, 8 1/2 to 9 1/2 cts for Common, 10 1/2 to 11 1/2 cts for Prime, 12 1/2 to 13 1/2 cts for Choice, and 14 1/2 to 15 1/2 cts for Extra. Yesterday there was a sale of 500 hbls, at 7 1/2 to 8 1/2 cts for inferior, 8 1/2 to 9 1/2 cts for Common, 10 1/2 to 11 1/2 cts for Prime, 12 1/2 to 13 1/2 cts for Choice, and 14 1/2 to 15 1/2 cts for Extra.

MOLASSES—Has been in good demand, and the receipts were sold readily on Saturday and Monday at prices showing an advance of 3 cts per gallon. The sales embraced 9000 bbls at 50 cts for inferior, 55 cts for Common, 60 cts for Prime, 65 cts for Choice, and 70 cts for Extra. The market exhibited less activity to-day and prices appeared to be a little easier.

WHEAT—The supplies are small, but the market has been quiet and prices have ruled low, although the business is only of a retail character. The principal sales since our last review have been confined to small lots, to dealers at 87 1/2 to 90 cts for No. 1, 91 1/2 to 93 cts for No. 2, 94 1/2 to 96 cts for No. 3, 97 1/2 to 99 cts for No. 4, 100 1/2 to 102 cts for No. 5, 103 1/2 to 105 cts for No. 6, 106 1/2 to 108 cts for No. 7, 109 1/2 to 111 cts for No. 8, 112 1/2 to 114 cts for No. 9, 115 1/2 to 117 cts for No. 10, 118 1/2 to 120 cts for No. 11, 121 1/2 to 123 cts for No. 12, 124 1/2 to 126 cts for No. 13, 127 1/2 to 129 cts for No. 14, 130 1/2 to 132 cts for No. 15, 133 1/2 to 135 cts for No. 16, 136 1/2 to 138 cts for No. COME AWAY!

"Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away."
—SOLOMON'S SONG.

The mighty steamer from her engine throbs,
Like pulse of my heart that beat for thee;
And streaming on the dark, but balmy air,
Are clouds of rolling smoke and sparks of fire,
That fill my soul with rapture as I tread
Her noble deck.

Delight enchants my soul;
My Father is a Prince: His stemmers walk
In such sublimity on every sea.
Why have I left you on your native shore?
Rise up, my love, my fair one, come away;
Come to behold the sunsets of the sea,
And smile at storms, secure on steamer's deck;
To walk the beach, where balmy breezes blow,
And gather shells and flowers upon the shore
Of fair and foreign lands.

To Calvary come,
And tread the sacred places of Judea;
To Egypt come, and take Prince John's new boat
And bear the Book of God along the Nile;
To Europe come, and tell redeeming love
To careless nations there.

The heathen die:
My Father bids me mount his ships and go,
That they may live. I've been before; but now
Rise up, my love, my fair one, come with me!
Come where the wondrous Tycoon of Japan
In palace sits, encircled by the moat
And inner wall,—whose princes fill
All Yots with their pageantry and trains;
To hills where you may stand and gaze around
For miles, on dwellings, temples, palaces
Of city sunk in sin.

Come to Pekin,
Within whose mighty walls, and inner wall,
And guarded courts of yellow masonry,
Beneath the spreading trees that rise above,
The palace of the Emperor is found,
Surrounded by the towers, domes, and towers,
And artificial mount.

You cannot see
This oriental man of dignity,
But placed upon your passport is his seal,
Protecting you in all his vast domain.
By this my hand has borne the Book of God
To six score cities, each with gates and walls.
But ere I go again I say to thee,
Rise up, my love, my fair one, come with me;
My love, oh come! oh come!

To India come;
And you shall see the place where Juggernaut
Once rolled its car; but now it rolls no more.
Where tigers flow; but now no mother
Her offspring in its flood.

Instead of this,
The rail road car of civilization bears
The Book of God; that crushes castles and creeds
Beneath its power of love. The telegraph Sends out electric light o'er all the land.
The military arm of Britain makes
Your life secure as on Columbia's shore;
And missionary stations everywhere,
With Bibles now translated in their tongues,
Assure us that they know the heavenly way;
But love Divine must win them to obey.
Thy love has won my heart, I'll win them too.
O rise, my love, my fair one, come away
To glory, honor, and eternal life,
In earth and heaven.

Come! come! O Spirit, come!
And lead the object of my soul's desire
To sweet submission to our Savior's foot,
That when I come again and to her say,
Rise up, my love, my fair one, come away,
Her soul with holy ardor shall obey,
And fly to win the heaven from his way.

RELIGION.

From the "German," by Prof. J. B. A. ADAMS.
Never was a people without religion.
"Thou mayst find countries—
—says Plutarch, the noble Greek—without fortresses, without laws, without money, without letters, but a country without God, without prayer, without religious exercises and sacrifices, no one has ever discovered!" The universality of religion is the best proof for the intrinsic necessity of the same. No more than eating and sleeping, was religion invented. She is founded in the constituent peculiarity of man's nature. Every man is under the influence of a constant spiritual locomotion toward God. Man's union with God is man's truth, and this union is religion.

As our eyes seek the light, so seek our minds eternal truth, so seek our hearts the eternal love of God. As in nature the law of gravitation irresistibly operates, so operates a spiritual gravitation in the spiritual world, going out from the grand centre—from God. In this spiritual gravitation lies the foundation of all religion among men. Her native home is the inmost life of man's soul. Religion concerns the intellect, (John, 17, 3;) the will, (John, 7, 17;) and the feeling, (Gal. 4, 15;)—these three powers, generally in the Scriptures denominated "heart," constitute the genial soil for the "fairest of all flowers"—religion.

But wherein consists religion?
Religion is nothing more nor less than faith. And, according to Heb.
ii, 1, consists faith not simply in an acquiescing opinion, but in an unshaken certainty with regard to spiritual matters. Faith is ever concerned with the invisible. From its nature faith cannot rest on rational demonstration, but on an indirect inward conviction. Personal experience is hence the sole basis of all true faith. It follows, farther, that if man will not believe, there are no possible means of compelling him to do so. God has made provisions that man may seem to have reasonable excuses for his unbelief.

The constituent manifestation of a religious life is prayer. Prayer is not the offspring of custom, has not been taught, but is the indirect, involuntary expression of the soul, growing out of the relation between God and man. Among the most cultivated nations of the anti-Christian era, prayer was highest regarded. Its neglect was the inevitable monitor of the approaching national decay. Prayer is the breath of the soul. As the fresh air of the mountains strengthens man's physical frame, so breathe we divine buoyancy in prayer. With it, the child of adversity—the poor nursing of the storm—resignedly withdraws from the clamor of the external world to the holiest of holies of his inmost soul, and enjoys there the blissful Sabbath of his God. Nothing raises man higher in the scale of being than prayer. There is certainly nothing more honorable for man than to commune with his Creator, to make known his wants, before Him, and thus effect, modify and change the sublime programme of Omnipotence. We speak advisedly when we say, that man, through prayer, participates in the government of the world.

Religion is the mother, and has always been the faithful nurse of all the intellectual development among men. The highest culture among mankind, is the daughter of religion. The stewards of religion, the priests, were at the same time the stewards of civilization. The arts—in the service of religion they were raised and reared. Architecture received her principal nurture from religion. And so with the plastic arts, sculpture and painting.
Also music, poetry, and formerly also the drama, were the handmaids of religion.

More: History instructs us that all intellectually and nationally fruitful times, times of religion were, and that in the wake of religious decay barbarism and despotism closely followed. The best proof for this are the chronicles of Israel. The same we discover in Greece and Rome. The loss of religion, and with it the neglect of moral obligations, was the first, and the loss of freedom and political significance was the second. So it was in Germany. There was a time when the German sword dictated to a Babel of nations, when the Empire of Germany was the only great power in Europe. That was the time when religion was still the soul of public opinion. The Germans' political shame is the direct product of the German's apostasy from true faith.

"O Lord, how long?"

It is a lamentable fact that in our day between the progress of modern culture, on the one hand, and religion on the other hand, such a pernicious estrangement has taken place. Religion belongs to no party; is neither monarchical nor republican, is indifferent both to absolutism and constitutionalism. The danger of our times cannot be ignored. There waits a grim, restless spirit of passion and error beyond the progress of the present for the spoil of the future. Physical power cannot conquer it—only religion can check its demoniac operation.

READING—NO. III.

Good reading is a shield and security against danger. A well read man is not so likely to be imposed upon by sophisms and humbugs as the unread is; not so likely to be the dupe of designing men in the business relations of life. His reputation for general information will to some extent shield him from unprin-ciple men, who are disposed to practice upon such as they think least informed, and most likely to fall victims to their artifices.

But it is from the moral perils of life that the man who loves reading is best secured. It is an adage as true as trite, that the idle man's brain is the devil's workshop. He that is fond of reading, is in little danger of being idle. Such an one is glad to escape from the imperious demand of business, to spend his leisure in high and delightful converse with the illustrious dead, whose imperishable and priceless thoughts are embalmed in their immortal works. To such a man the stimulating glass has no charms—low and trifling talk cannot meet the intellectual needs and tastes of one accustomed to the society of the noblest minds in their loftiest moods of thought. He needs not the excitement of the gaming table, nor the low inspiration of more vulgar associations. In the calm retirement of his chamber, communing with the wise, the witty and the good, his evening and leisure hours pass pleasantly and profitably without a sigh, or wish to mingle in more noisy and less intellectual company.
Thus while those who have cultivated no taste for books, are wasting time, periling health, fortune and morals in riotous scenes, the man of books, secured from these perils, is progressing towards a heritage of peace and honor.

As a taste for reading is so strong a security against temptations to vice, we recognize how important to all the best interests and hopes of young men, that this taste should be encouraged and promoted. It would certainly be best to spend our time in reading books of solid value, but if the young have no taste for such reading, shall they read nothing? By no means. Let them read, Robinson Crusoe, The Arabian Nights Entertainments,
The Vicar of Wakefield, and works of a kindred class that are at least interesting and innocent, if not instructive, rather than not read at all. In my opinion, almost any reading not positively demoralizing, is better than no reading; for even works of the kind alluded to, will keep from worse things, and in the end cultivate a taste for books of a higher and more instructive class.
I would advise, gather about you not only standard books, but biographies, travels, periodicals, and almost anything that will innocently interest the mind, and cultivate a taste for more solid and useful reading. Remember, however, that although we believe that poor food is better than starvation, we do not believe that poison is; it is always better to die naturally than to commit suicide. Some books are positively poison, and it has been strongly said of them that they would inoculate a lost soul with a new disease; such can only do mischief, and that continually. It is innocent reading, then, if not always instructive, that we would recommend; and that leaves the minds of the young against the crevasse of evil.

We live in an age peculiarly favorable to those who have an aspiration for knowledge. Before the discovery of the art of printing, books were manufactured by the slow process of copying with the pen. A few centuries ago it would have required the whole earnings of a laboring man, thirteen years, to purchase one Bible. Now the same class of laborers can buy a good copy of the Bible with the labor of a single hour. A few centuries ago, there were but few books upon subjects of general interest and the greater part of these were locked up in the languages of departed ages, and entirely inaccessible to the great mass of the uncultivated millions. Four centuries ago nearly all the History, Philosophy, mental, moral and physical, the poetry, the law, the medicine, and the ology, were in the Greek and Latin languages, and it was imperative upon all who would read these books to study these silent tongues; but now they are all translated by men of the ripest scholarship and rendered into elegant and classical English. These treasures of anti-cient wisdom and learning are now accessible to all who can read their mother tongue, and the necessity for the study of the ancient languages has been greatly lessened, except for professional purposes and scholastic polish. Our advantages do not stop here; the march of modern civilization and science has developed and brought much that was unknown to the ancients, especially in the various branches of natural philosophy and geography. Since the days of Bacon, science has taken far more practical cast. The ancient thinkers despised the practical, and loved to soar up into the towering altitudes of abstraction and idealism. This learning was mainly designed for the cultivated and superior classes.

It is the glory of modern science and literature, that it is adapted to the wants, and is meant to elevate and bless the toiling millions of our race. God be praised for good books, the instructors of our youth, the companions of our riper years,
and our counsellors and comforters at any period, and under all the manifold necessities of human fortune.

CHINA MISSION.

DEAR BROTHER:

I will now give in detail an account of a glorious revival which is now going on in the North of China, in the Shantung province. It was sent to me in a letter from two English Methodist Missionaries with whom I am well acquainted.

Extract from Mr. Junocent's letter:

"Let me tell you a little cheering news—cheering it must be to every one who has the cause of Christ and the welfare of China at heart. Mr.
Hall and I (Mr. Junocent) have been to Laou Sing, in Shantung, where the old man came from, of whom I spoke in Shanghai. We had previously sent our native preacher and his wife to labor there at the urgent request of the people.
They found a genuine work of grace going on among the people. Their arrival and labors drew many people from surrounding villages, and for a month before our arrival, they had been holding daily meetings for prayer, expounding the Scriptures, and conversing with the people about their spiritual concerns. Every Sabbath there were men who came from 70 to 75 le (20 and 30 miles) to hear the gospel, and be present at the religious services of the day—all respectable persons.
Many of them intelligent reading men. During the week those at a distance read the Christian books, and those near attended the preaching service every night. Nearly one hundred people have renounced idolatry, and regularly observe the duty of prayer. Most of these have applied for Christian baptism. This number includes men and women, for our helper's wife, who is a most earnest Christian, has been most indefatigable in her labors, and greatly blessed of God in leading souls to Christ. Six or seven whole families are striving to follow Christ, and have daily prayer in their houses.
This was the state of things when we visited the place, so that it is not the Foreign Teacher who has been the attraction—the work is manifestly of God. We gave ourselves to a careful study of the nature of the work and examined the applicants for baptism, and many most interesting cases of strong faith came under our notice during the fortnight or three weeks we were there. The result of our investigation was to decide upon forty-seven most promising cases as fit for baptism, and forty-five of these were baptised by us on Sunday, 23rd of September. Twenty-seven of these are men, and eighteen women. There are other very encouraging cases which we think will soon require our recognition. But the result as it stands at present makes us ask—what hath God wrought? Truly the Divine Spirit is at work in this place and shall yet see great things. You know I am not one of the most enthusiastic about Chinese conversions, but I confess that here I felt the hand of God was manifestly revealed, and though I rejoice, I rejoice with trembling, lest Satan should get an advantage. Of this I am confident "that He who hath begun the good work is able to carry it on," and to his care and love I prayerfully commend their souls. I may mention that one rich intelligent man, who is one of the most earnest, and has been going every Sunday 30 le (10 miles), to hear the gospel and keep the Sabbath, has offered us rent free, a house with thirteen rooms in his village for a chapel and preacher's residence. There are about ten believers who live in and around his village, and he has them every day at his house for reading of the scriptures and prayer. He does not attempt to expound, for he is a very humble man, but he exhorts those of his neighbors whom he knows have not been hearing the gospel. This man's example is exerting a most beneficial influence. The place where the revival is going on is about 50 le (20 miles) from the district city of Laou-Ling, and that same man has a house in the city which he wants us to take and use for preaching the Gospel. And in both cases he is decided in refusing all rent on any consideration for his house.

There are only two schoolmasters in the village, and both of them are believers, and has prayer in his school every morning."

I am happy to say, that this native helper of whom Mr. Junocent speaks, is a member of our Church, and is now an honored instrument in the hand of God. He was baptized some seven years ago in Shanghai, and afterward removed to Shantung. His name is Hu.

J. W. LAMBETH.

WHY UNITARIANISM IS FAILING.

We quote from a letter in the Christian Intelligencer of Dec. 13th:

"The familiar lines of Mr Bryant which describe error as 'writting in pain and dying among its worshippers,' appear to be finding their fulfillment in the present condition of Unitarianism, here and hereabouts. In Boston, where it once had a sort of moribund energy, it lies prostrate with marasmus. It has writhed itself early out of the pulpit and of the sphere of religion, and lies caddled in its weakness upon the dry bosoms of certain literary nurses there, who refusing to give it the 'sincere milk of the Word,' will probably kill it outright ere long by feeding it on such innutritive food as puffeth up, and produces much ventose distress and eructive groaning, indicative both of speedy dissolution.

"The decline of Unitarianism in New England produces a natural alarm among its adherents, which has been followed elsewhere by various efforts to secure a new start for a very old and now well-nigh obsolete ism. Time was when Channing and Sears, and others of their class, gave a certain sanctity and power to their system of speculative faith. But that time has gone, and Unitarianism is now regarded as only the name of one phase of modern infidelity. Theodore Parker, Dr. Bellows and the Frorthinghams have labored successfully to reduce Unitarianism to a mere congeries of barren negatives. True, their views do not concur in respect to any one principle of positive belief; but they are on record as open opponents of every single vital doctrine of the Bible. They reject the doctrine of moral corruption; deny that the Word of God is so inspired as to be an infallible rule of faith and practice; have heard, but do not believe that there is a Holy Spirit ministering to human infirmities; and regard the idea of the atonement as absurd. The weakness and faulty of their position are both especially demonstrated in their contradictory and inexplicable notions respecting Christ. Unwilling to receive him on the testimony of his own words, they adopt principles of interpretation which even the arch rationalist Strauss has been compelled to reject.

"Yet Dr. Bellows wonders, or affects to wonder, why Unitarianism remains so unpopular. We can tell him. The people who read their Bibles know that there is nothing in Unitarianism that is divine, and therefore it has no capability of meeting their spiritual and intellectual wants."

The Dead of 1866.

The death-roll of the year includes many names distinguished in politics, in the church, in authorship and in art. We note a few of them:

The ranks of the authors have been thinned. Fredrika Bremer died at Stockholm early in the year; Jared Sparks at Cambridge in March; Joseph Mery in France in June; and Count Garowski at Washington in May.

Among the dead statesmen and political leaders are Daniel S. Dickinson, Lewis Cass, John Van Buren, Elijah P. Purdy, Moses F. O'Connell, James Humphrey, Senators Foot and Wright, and Commodore Stockton. Prince Esterhazy died at Ratis-bon in May, and Marquis D'Azeglio in Italy in January. In October Mr. Thouvenel closed his long and active career in France.

Gordon Cumming, the famous lion hoo-ter, was accidentally killed in Scotland in March. Professor Henry D. Rogers, a distinguished savant, also died in Scotland in May.

John Ross, chief of the Cherokee Nation, died at Washington in August.

The sculptor Gibson died in Italy in January, seventy-five years old; and Sir Charles Eastlake, President of the British Royal Academy, died at Pisa just as the new year came in.

The most prominent clergymen who have died during the year are Dr. Cumming and Pie of the Roman Catholic Church; Dr. Eliphalet Nott, President of Union College; Dr. Hawks, the hore-tamer, died in Ohio in October. Robt. B.
Mingarn, one of our leading merchants,
died on the 9th of January. Gerard Hal-lock, at New Haven, in the same month.
Simon Draper and Police Inspector Carpenter in November; and Gen. S. R. Or-tis, in December.—Washington Republican.

Gen. Scott died at West Point on the 27th of May. Admiral Parry, commander of the Spanish fleet on the Pacific, committed suicide. John S. Rarey, the hore-tamer, died in Ohio in October. Robt. B.
Mingarn, one of our leading merchants,
died on the 9th of January. Gerard Hal-
lock, at New Haven, in the same month.
Simon Draper and Police Inspector Carpenter in November; and Gen. S. R. Or-tis, in December.—Washington Republican.

The Lord's Prayer.—Did you ever think, short though it is, how much there is in it? "O, it is beautiful!"

Like a diamond in the crown of a queen, it unites a thousand sparkling gems in one.

It teaches all of us, every one of us, to look to God as our parent—
"Our Father."

It prompts us to raise our thoughts and our desires above the earth—"Who art in heaven."

It tells us that we must reverence our Heavenly Father—"Hallowed be thy name."

It breathes the saint's reward—
"Thy kingdom come."

And a submissive, obedient spirit—"Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

And a dependent, trusting spirit—
"Give us this day our daily bread."

And a forgiving spirit—"Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us."

And a cautious spirit—"Deliver us from evil."

And, last of all, an adoring spirit—"For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever and ever. Amen."

From the Educational Monthly.

RADICAL DEFECT IN EDUCATION.

Notwithstanding our formal schools, and the graduation so scrupulously carried out in our cities and large towns, education, as commonly pursued, is yet radically defective. There have been great improvements, but they are mostly in the minutiae of modes and forms, and not so much in what is fundamental. The very spirit with which education is conducted is generally wrong. It is made too much like drudgery both for teacher and pupil. It is based upon the idea that the mind has a natural repugnance to the acquisition of knowledge, rather than a natural taste for it; and must therefore be put to it as a series of unwelcome tasks. Never was there a more false idea. The mind has as natural an appetite for knowledge as the body has for food. Knowledge is really the food of the mind, and it craves it. It must have it. It will have it in some form, and if it does not get it from teachers, it will get it from other sources. The office of the teacher should be to furnish food to the mind which is appropriate to its condition in its different stages of advancement. And it should be real food, and not indigestible husks. It should be palatable and not disgusting. It should not be unnecessarily dry, but should be administered with the succulence that nature has given it.

These are plain truths, but they are, to a great extent, disregarded in education, as a few palpable facts will show. Take a fact which is by no means singular in the experience of our colleges. Here is a young man of decided literary tastes, who goes through college, getting his lessons with only enough correctness to barely sustain a respectable standing, and receiving therefor at the end no appointment, or if any, a low one. He, however, reads quite extensively English literature, and pays much attention to writing compositions, and to debating in the societies. He has a high standing among his classmates as a man of talent, and perhaps obtains some of the best literary honors in the forms of prizes. And after leaving college, he is a prominent man in some station which affords scope for his literary powers. Now if college education were rightly conducted, it is clear that a portion of it—that which is literary—certainly should have coincided with the tastes of such a man, to say nothing of the mathematical and philosophical portions of it. He ought to have been so taught in the languages, as to have been instructed in this department of study, for this has a direct coincidence with his aim and his inclinations. The very fact that he was not interested, shows that he was taught after a wrong mode—that the mental food was not presented in the right way—and so he turned from it with disgust, and sought it in more agreeable forms. Not that he derived no good from his college studies. His mind did pick up here and there some crumbs from the daily recitation, which aided a little in its nutrition. But the recitations should have been so conducted, that his chief mental nourishment should have been obtained here, only to be added to by what he obtained from other sources.

Such instances, together with other facts, show that the whole mode of teaching the languages in our academies and colleges needs a radical alteration. What Mrs. Stowe calls in her "Little Foxes" the "technical, pedantic mode of teaching," must be exchanged for nature's mode. There is no necessity for its being made a disagreeable task. There is essential interest in study, but of this it is mostly, if not altogether, despoiled, especially in the outset, so that to most students the early recollections of their Latin and Greek studies are anything but pleasant. They can sympathize with Ole Bull, who when he saw some one trying to push a school boy from the steps of an omnibus, where he was stealing a ride, said, "Poor boy! let him stay. Who knows his trials? Perhaps he studies Latin." Or with Heinemann, who wittily said of his endurance of the Latin tasks at school, "The Romans never would have conquered the world if they had had to learn their own language. They had leisure, because they were born with the knowledge of what nouns form their accusative in."

But there are tokens of the necessity of a radical change in the very spirit of education to be seen in other departments besides that of the college and its preparatory stage. We will take another very common case in illustration. A young lady of good natural abilities is carried through what is considered an adequate course of education. During the whole of it she takes little interest in her studies, and escapes whenever she can from the tedium of her tasks in school. In the story and novel for relief. And when she finishes her course, she rapidly forgets much of what she has learned, discontinuing all study and nearly all thought in that line, and now resorts wholly to the novel for mental food, which is as irrational and destructive as it would be to feed the body wholly on confectionery. Is it right to attribute this to a native frivolity of mind? Is the learning of what is useful and solid really repugnant to most girls? We do not believe this. The explanation is to be found in the fact, that the education of the school-room is not what it should be. It is not adapted to meet the natural cravings of the mind. The subjects taught are stripped of the interest that essentially belongs to them. We have, to a great extent, the same dry and pedantic mode in other branches, as in Latin and Greek. We have a good illustration in the common mode of teaching Botany. Here the mind is disgusted with classifications and long lists of hard names, while the phenomena of vegetation, which should constitute the great staple of instruction in this science, are left almost entirely out of view. In my experience, very few of those who have studied it, have an intelligent idea even of the circulation of the sap in a plant or tree. Let all this be reversed, and let the classifications and hard names be merely incidental and subsidiary to the study of vegetable physiology, and there are few minds so frivolous that they will not be interested. The same thing can be said essentially of the Human Physiology, Zoology, Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, etc. A lady of very decided mental power told me that she remembered distinctly thinking over, when a school-girl, her study of a book on chemistry, after she had finished it, and coming to the conclusion that all that she could recollect of her knowledge, which she had acquired from it, was, that caloric was another word for heat. Here was no deficiency of mind to account for this blank; but the science was so poorly taught by both text-book and teacher, that its wonderful facts, so interesting even to common minds when properly brought out, failed to make any distinct impressions upon a mind really gifted with extraordinary talent.

What would you think of a man who should show you a skeleton, and call it a man? And yet this is a fair representation of what most text-books and teachers are doing with their pupils. They give them the mere dry bones, the skeleton of the branches which they teach. I have spoken especially of the instruction of girls. What I have said of them is true of boys, with this exception—when they have finished their school or college course, their engagement in the duties of active life does not permit them to break off so entirely from all connection with their previous education. They are forced by circumstances to retain some of the habits of mind and trains of thought of their pupilage. The novel, therefore, does not so entirely constitute their future mental food as it does with the young lady.

In education generally, there is too much of the teaching of words, and modes of expression, and formula, and processes, while the things to which these refer, are either not taught at all, or are taught in an imperfect and indefinite manner. The memory is burdened largely, while the thinking powers are left to be uncultivated—nay, more, are actually repressed, for inquiry on the part of a pupil as to reason of a thing, meets generally with a rebuke from teachers who consider themselves to be mere recitation-hearers. In most of our schools a premium is put upon mere parrotry, while downright, independent thought is such at a discount. A great deal is said about the importance of discipline of the mind, but the term, as often applied, is a misnomer. A training, a discipline of the memory is not discipline of the whole mind, but of a part of it, and that an inferior part.

When will teachers come to realize the great truth that in education interest comes only from understanding things? The repetition of words and forms of expression, without understanding them, is very dry work, and yet this is the prominent business of most school-rooms. Perhaps most teachers who read this statement will doubt its truth. But let me ask them whether they are not too much in the habit of presuming that what their pupils repeat so accurately is of course understood? Let them test the matter by questioning, and they will be astonished often at the ignorance that will be developed. We are apt to forget that what is simple to us, may be an unknown mystery to a child. We know of course what a square foot is; but I have known many a child to recite square measure glibly, that could not tell me what the difference is between a foot and a square foot. It is the office of the teacher to make the pupil understand the meaning of things, and if this be faithfully done, there will be an interest in the school-room that can never be had with the common parrot-mode of teaching. It is just as gratifying to a child to understand as it is to an adult, and the teacher who takes pains on this point, has an incentive to study, operating on the minds of the pupils, which will transcend the influence of prizes and all other inducements, and besides this, save much of the labor of discipline in the school.

There is too much of mere drilling in education. There are many good drillers who are far from being good teachers. Drilling is well but it is only a part, and a subordinate part of teaching. A good driller will make a scholar go through his Latin grammar well, and will thoroughly ground him in the rules, as it is expressed. But this is carrying him through needless work, and tends to make him a dry, stiff Latin scholar, not a full, ripe one, who in learning the language of the Romans, has entered into the spirit of their very life.

There is too much of general drilling. The individual is lost in the mass. This makes a school appear well. There is something taking in order and uniformity of movement, but if too much is made of such things, the teaching of the individual scholar, which implies meeting his mental necessities, as distinct to some extent from those of other pupils, will be neglected. I lay it down as a rule, that no teacher has done his duty to his pupil who has not awakened in him spontaneous activity of mind, and the only evidence of this is an enquiring spirit. The manifestation of this is questioning of the teacher by the pupil but the drill of the school-room is very commonly such as to forbid this. In this general drilling, there is too much of sitting bolt upright. To say nothing of the influence upon vigor and health of this constrained and fixed position, it has a constraining, depressing influence upon the mind. Variety in position ought to be allowed most of the time in the school. There are other points that I should like to enlarge upon, but there is not space or time. I cannot, however, dismiss this subject without alluding to the general exclusion of the natural sciences from education, as one of the prominent causes of the pupil's lack of interest in the exercises of the school-room. What nature spreads out before us in air and water, and upon the earth, is interesting to all grades of scholars. The simplest facts of natural science are interesting even to the young child, if brought before him in a proper manner. Children are better philosophers than is commonly supposed. They peer with curious eyes into the things which they see all around them, and ply teachers and parents and aunts with inquiries as to the reason of these things, till their inquiry (we may call it philosophical) spirit fairly dies out, from the indifference with which it so generally meets. To foster such a spirit should be one of the great aims of education, and to this end natural science should be systematically taught throughout the whole course of education, beginning at the outset, and having the same gradations as in the teaching of language and mathematics. If this were done, a new interest would be given to the school-room—that which comes from the learning of things, instead of the mere memorizing of words, and forms of expression, and similar, and processes. Indeed it would give a new interest to mathematics and language, for some of the most interesting applications of mathematics are developed by natural science, and natural objects and phenomena furnish largely the material of language.

THE POPE.

The Patrie of Dec 12th expresses very neatly the Imperial idea about the Pope. It says:

The execution of the September convention will be a fait accompli to-morrow. Despite sinister prophecies and violent excitements, despite counsels more interested than sincere, we firmly hope that the Pope will not abandon the tomb of the Apostles. Pius IX will remain at Rome protected by the convention which France has loyally executed, and which Italy will not wish to break.

Why may we not hope that the Pope, rising by virtue of his great sagacity above the passions which rage around him, and reverting to the first policy of his Pontificate, be willing to give to the Romans an administrative system more in harmony with the spirit of the age, and to take due account of those political necessities to which all foreigners are subject? Will his sacred character suffer by his ceasing to attach to human institutions, so changing in their nature, that immobility which characterizes religious things? Will the majesty of the Pontiff be compromised by giving more liberal institutions to the Roman people? or will he be less revered by them when he shall bestow the benediction upon Rome and the universe in the great Catholic festivities.

RITUALISM IN THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

PLAIN SPOKEN LETTER BY BISHOP McILVAINE.

In the last number of the Western Episcopalian the following letter from Bishop McIlvaine to the editor is published:

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1866.

Reverend and Dear Sir—I was very much pleased that you placed so prominently in your paper the noble speech of the Rev. J. Cotton Smith, D. D., at the late anniversary of the Evangelical Society of New York, on the ritualistic tendencies and abominations which have become so alarming in the Church of England, and are coming out so boldly, and with such evident combination of plan and effort in our Church of the United States.

I have used the word abominations. I might have said, puerilities, follies, etc., with entire justice; but abominations includes all that, and means much more. Some ritualism all Christians have, among whom there is any rite. We have had ritualism in our sacraments and confirmation, and in all the simple ceremonial which, from the organization of our American church, has marked their observance. And we want no more. But the ritualism now rising before us and claiming free scope to do what it lists in our churches, is not a mere unauthorized and deforming increase of ceremonial upon what we have been accustomed to. It is not merely that the one bowing to the name of Jesus in the creed (which, by the way, is no part of the ceremonial of our worship, as many of our people seem not to know), has grown to divers bowings to this and that, by minister and people, and by some (I have heard) where "the Virgin Mary" comes in the creed. It is not merely that in the one instance which the officiating minister is directed in our Rubrics, while standing, to "turn the Lord's table," has budded and blossomed into divers turnings, which are now seen in some of our advanced churches, by choristers as well as "celebrants," to use a word which ritualism has chosen from Romish phraseology. It is not merely that the single instance of the sign of the cross in baptism, provided for by our church directions, has effervesced and is multiplying into various other signs and mystic significations, such as crosses on the Lord's table, of wood or stone, on clerical robes, crosses everywhere—candles on the table and in the chancel, burning in broad daylight, etc.

If we look at all these things simply as an increased ceremonial, I should be content to speak of them as puerilities. But in the intention of those who are zealous for the ritualism which now aspires to place itself, high and lifted up, in our churches, no such comparatively innocent thing limits their view. And he who is so innocent as to suppose those men so innocent, is to be pitied. Of course it all means doctrine—advanced doctrine—such as the simple ritualism of our church hitherto has not taught. It means what a leader in the American movement meant when he said recently in a published discourse, and from one of the highest places of the diocese of New York, that the reformation brought on "the dark ages." It means return to what the reformation cast out with indignation. It means the reassertion of what, as a protestant church, we have protested against ever since the Reformation. It means the turning our backs upon all our great Protestant divines, and the repudiation of our chief Protestant articles of religion. It means Romanism, in all its strength and substance, and antagonism to the true Gospel of Christ. It means transubstantiation—the sacrifices of the mass—a auricular confession, the subjection of the minds and consciences of men to the dictum of the priest; the closing up of all access to Christ and His salvation to the narrow ministrations of a priest; jurisdiction by efficiency of sacraments, through a righteousness in ourselves by works, instead of the righteousness of Christ by faith. It means penances, prayers for the dead, and purgatory, the necessity of a priest's absolution to the remission of sins. It means the full priestly character of the Christian minister, the full sacrificial and propitiatory character, for the living and the dead, of the Lord's Supper. It means Romish bondage for Christian liberty, a scrupulous, sentimental, deceitful formalism for the worship of God "in spirit and in truth." It means, in one word, the identification, in effect, of inward and spiritual religion with the outward and visible form, and that a form, for the most part, of man's contrivance. It means, I say again, Romanism, and that is enough to say, and therefore we say "abominations" as well as follies. If the movement has not yet grown to all the development given above, it is fast attaining that far. Let it alone and the rebellion will soon show its genuine colors at high mass, and high mass will not be far behind.

But it is no new movement. It is simply that very out-cropping of the Tractarian movement which, since its first appearance, in 1833, has never ceased its machinations or advances. Many good men for years supposed it essentially dead. I never did. I constantly maintained the reverse. It has simply waited to prepare the way, to get the minds and eyes of our people accustomed to certain introductory ideas and pretensions and phrases and furniture and manipulations and postures and symbols before it should venture to come out in its new robes of sacrifice and its new books of devotion, which the censor and the inquisitor and all the told impudence which, in some instances, has so transformed the aspect of our simple liturgical worship, that we have all to learn our public worship over again, before the prayer book, thus presented, can justly be called "the Book of Common Prayer."

CHAS. P. McILVAINE.

NORTHERN METHODISM IN CHINA.

The plan of the work for the year was as follows:

1. East Fowchow Circuit, comprising the Min and Changlok Districts: S. L. Baldwin, Missionary; Tang-let K'ong, Hu long Mi, Hu Sing Mi, native helpers.
2. Nantai Circuit, comprising Hokeh'ang and Inghok Districts: O. Gibson, Missionary; Yeh Ing Kwang, Ling Ching Tiag, native helpers.
3. North Fowchow Circuit, comprising Longwong and Lienkong Districts: R. S. MacLay, Missionary; Hu Po Mi, Ngn Sin Mi, Li Tai Sing, native helpers.
4. Western Circuit, comprising Ankwang and Minch'ang Districts: Nathan Sites, Missionary; Li Lu Mi, Li Sung Mi, Li Cha Mi, native helpers.
5. Interior Circuit, comprising the Kucheng and Pingnaung Districts: Missionary to be applied; Hu Heng Mi, native helper.
6. Boy's Boarding-school: Otis Gibson, Principal.
7. Girls' Boarding-school: Miss Beulah Woolston, Preceptress; Miss S. H. Woolston, Assistant.
8. Printing Office: S. L. Baldwin, Superintendent.
9. Translating Committee: R. S. MacLay, Otis Gibson.
10. Foundling Asylum: Mrs. H. C. MacLay.
11. American Sunday-school: Mrs. Etio E. Baldwin.

Besides the mission force already described we have a Christian boarding-school teacher, and six hands in the printing office, all Christian. We have a boarding-school with 12 boys, another with 23 girls. Our property consists of 1. Printing office, worth $5,000. 2. The mission compound, on a healthy, eligible spot overlooking the city of Fowchow. It contains six lots, each being about 150 feet by 100'. On this are six dwelling houses, all except two of brick, with stone foundations, and valued as follows: Number one, $600; number two, $600; number three, $1,500; number four, $1,500; number five, $3,000; number six, $5,000. There are three church edifices valued as follows, namely: One in the city, $2,500; one on the north side of the river, $2,500; one on the south side of the river, $3,000; all brick. At Ato a small chapel, on rented land, worth $250. Nine chapels at out stations all rented but two, one at N'gungang, valued at $500; one at K'ingchang, valued at $250. A chapel at Quannichang, $50. An orphanage for castaway children valued at $600; the number of children in it was 31, and they were supported by local contributions. As to the sphere of operation, on week days our congregations are composed of all classes, on Sabbath of members and other serious persons. There are five preaching places in the city, and an average attendance on Sabbath (including pupils and servants) of fifty persons at each place. Beyond the city we have six Sunday congregations, with an average attendance of fifteen at each. The number of members raised among themselves for the Centenary one hundred and ten rupees, ($55). The missionaries and native preachers had already given. This contribution of the native private members was very large, in view of their poverty. I doubt whether one of them has enough in hand to supply his family's wants for a single month.

HOME MISSIONARIES OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—The American Church Missionary Society employs thirty-eight missionaries, who are distributed as follows: Delaware, 2; Illinois, 2; Iowa, 1; Kansas, 10; Kentucky, 2; Maryland, 1; Massachusetts, 1; Nevada, 3; Ohio, 1; West Virginia, 2; Tennessee, 2; New York, 1.

MISSIONARY NEWSPAPER.—The missionaries in Canton have established a weekly newspaper in the Chinese language.

CENTENARY CAMP-MEETING IN INDIA.

Rev. W. C. Judd, in his annual report to the Mission Rooms, says:

We commenced our Centenary camp meeting for the Bareilly district on the 29th of October, and continued it seven days. This was a new thing here, as none but our American brethren and sisters had ever seen such a meeting. We entered upon it with some anxiety as to the result. But, I am happy to say, our fears were groundless. God was with us in power, and it exceeded in interest my most sanguine expectations. We had a general rally from all parts of the district. There was an attendance of about one hundred Christians, and from the first to the last a larger attendance of Hindus and Mussulmans than we had dared to hope for. At times it was thought we had one hundred or more from the villages.

The services took the form of a regular or protracted camp meeting at home. After preaching, some brother would exhort, and invite sinners to rise up for prayer; and sometimes they were invited forward, when we would all engage in prayer with them, and several professed to be greatly blessed. It was also a time of great searching of hearts. I have never seen our native brethren and sisters so thoroughly aroused as they seemed to be during this meeting. It did us all good, and I trust the effects will be lasting. The native private communicants is 131; of probationers, 28; of baptisms during past year, 51; and of additions, 34. The Sunday-schools are eight, and their scholars 150. The amount contributed by the members for missionary purposes $55. The probable number of pagans to whom we preach weekly is 3,000, namely: 2,000 within the city, and 1,000 without. Our members are generally intelligent and pious Christians. About fifty of them are dependent, more or less, upon the mission for support.

SKETCH OF LUTHER, BY CHARLEY.—A coarse, rugged, plowman face it was, with great crags of cheekbones—a wild amount of passionate energy and appetite! But in his dark eyes were floods of sorrow, and the deepest melancholy, sweetness were all there. Often did there seem to meet in Luther the very opposite points in man's character. He, for example, for whom Richter had said his words were half battles, he, when he first began to preach, suffered unheard agony. "Oh, Dr. Staupitz, Dr. Staupitz," said he to the vicar-general of his order: "I can not do it, I shall die in three months. Indeed, I can not do it."

Dr. Staupitz, a wise and considerate man, said upon this: "Well, Sir Martin, if you must die, you must; but remember that they need good heads up yonder, too. So preach, man, preach, and then live or die, as it happens." So Luther preached and lived, and he became, indeed, one great whirlwind of energy to work without resting in this world; and also before he died he wrote very many books—books in which the true man, for in the midst of all they denominated and cursed, what touches of tenderness lay. Look at the Table Talk, for example.

A gentleman whose name is well known to the public, and who has gained a deservedly high reputation in the photographic and artistic world, told me, that when in Finland he called with some friends at a roadside cottage, and desired to be accommodated with some boiled eggs, a portion of which were to be boiled hard. The damsel who superintended the boiling chanted a sing-song charm during the culinary process. This she repeated twice, and turned herself round six times; the soft-boiled eggs were then considered to be sufficiently done. She then repeated her verse for a third time, and turned herself round thrice; when the hard-boiled eggs were deemed to be ready for eating. They had no clock, dial, clepsydra, hour-glass, burning of tapers, or any other method of measuring the time necessary for the egg-boiling, than this chanting of the song; and a like kind of formula was repeated for similar domestic purposes, these "household words" being supposed to depend for their efficacy upon the full belief in the charm they were presumed to cause. The application of this to the incantations of witches is sufficiently obvious.

AN IMPORTANT DIFFERENCE.—A youth who much desired to wear the matrimonial yoke had not sufficient courage to "pop the question." On informing his father of the difficulty he labored under, the old gentleman replied passionately, "Why you great booby, how do you suppose I managed when I got married?" "Oh," said the hapless lover, "you married mother, but I've got to marry a strange gal."

FARM AND GARDEN.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION, 1867.

The Universal exhibition, of 1867, will surpass all its predecessors not only in actual extent, but also in the comprehensiveness of its design; it will include all that was comprised in former plans, and several important features in addition. As regards the former portion of the programme, little need be said: there is no doubt that the classes of raw materials, tools, machinery, and manufactured products, as well as that of the Fine Arts, will all exhibit a proportionate amount of progress; and the applications for space have been greatly beyond the capacities of the building.

The site devoted to the Exhibition is a parallelogram, rather more than 3,250 feet long by 1,365 feet wide; the building will measure about 1,000 feet by 1,250 feet, and in consequence of its rounded form a very large space of ground will be left unoccupied. Moreover, the inner wall of the building will circumscribe a garden more than 500 feet long by nearly 200 feet broad. This large extent of park and garden will afford means which former Exhibitions have only possessed to a very small extent for the exhibition of objects relating to natural history, agriculture, horticulture, acclimation, rural matters, and manufactures requiring a considerable space, isolation, or both. The programme includes an exhibition of horses, cattle and domestic animals; but, as breeders would be deterred by the long period of seven months—the Exhibition being announced to open on the first day of April, and to close on the last day of October—it is arranged that animals may be exhibited for short periods only, and be replaced from time to time by others of the same class and the same localities. The exhibition of living animals will, therefore, be permanent, while the animals themselves may be frequently renewed. Amongst other matters in this class which are likely to present peculiar attractions is the rearing and management of silk worms, in which the French and Italian departments will be especially prominent; and side by side with the insects of Europe will be shown those of India, China and Japan, which feed on the leaves of the mulberry, oak, alantus (or Japan varnish tree, as it is erroneously called), juniper, and castor-oil plant. This portion of the Exhibition will be all the more interesting from the fact, that the Alantus and other worms, some of them as large as a man's finger and exquisitely beautiful, will be seen in the open air, and may be studied as in a state of nature. Naturalists visiting the Jardin d'Acclimation in the Bois de Boulogne, and the experimental establishment of M. Guérin Meneville at Vincennes, may have seen these creatures in their normal condition, but to the public generally the sight will be novel and interesting.

As the production of honey and wax is one of the most universally extended occupations, the comparison of the various systems employed therein cannot fail to be suggestive. The honey of Hyettus has lost none of its celebrity, though more than two thousand years have rolled away since its praises were first sung. It figured at Kensington in 1861; perhaps the bees themselves may appear in the Champ de Mars next year.

In Horticulture our neighbours, being at home, will have a great advantage over their visitors. The moment the ground can be prepared to receive them, the French gardeners and horticulturists, with the Imperial Societies of Agriculture and Horticulture at their head, will lay out their plantations and parterres; and they have done so much of late in acclimation of plants, and the floral decoration of public pleasure-grounds, that we may look for an extremely interesting exhibition in this class on the French side. The system of transplanting large trees, so successfully employed by the late Sir Joseph Paxton, has been carried out to a great extent by the authorities of Paris, and there is no doubt that some daring feats of this kind will be exhibited in the planting of the ornamental portions of the Exhibition Park.

We have been favoured with a view of the draft plans for the Horticultural Exhibition, to which one corner of the park, equal to twelve acres in extent, has been devoted; and we may mention that they include the great aquariums, about which some extraordinary statements have been made. The arrangements adopted falls little short of the rumours to which we refer.

There are to be aquariums both for fresh and salt water fish, and each will be connected with a cascade, which in the former case will serve to aerate the water to be pumped back into the aquarium. The tanks are to be of great size, and to be so constructed that the people may pass beneath them, and thus view the fish from below as well as above. The management of the horticultural portion of the Exhibition is entrusted to M. Barillet Deschamps, the chief gardener of the city of Paris, and it could not be in better hands. We are glad to find, that the British horticulturists have accepted the invitation of the Imperial Commission, and will co-operate with their French brethren in this interesting section of the Universal Exhibition.

Model farm buildings, cottages, and rural constructions of all kinds, will be encouraged in every possible way, and it would be disgraceful to England and Scotland did they not take up a prominent position in this class. They have not perhaps very much to learn of others in this department; but, to put the matter on the lowest ground, it would be doing an injustice to Great Britain not to let the world at large see how much economic science and philanthropy combined have effected for the well-being, moral as well as material, of her agricultural class, which is perhaps the best-fod, the best housed, and the best provided for in every way, in all Europe. If in one corner of the Exhibition Park there be not a model English farm, and a model English cottage or two, with rose-clad porch and garden-patch—things scarcely known on the Continent—one chance of correcting an error that exists pretty generally abroad respecting the habits of our island will be lost. We are looked upon as the most matter-of-fact people in Europe, and it would be well that our neighbours should know that the rural districts of England are as remarkable for the production of ornamental flowers as for that of heavy crops.

A variety of the most important national industries dependent upon agriculture, besides those already mentioned, will, of course, be represented. The French department will, doubtless, be highly attractive in this respect, and will include model establishments connected with the manufacture of wine, the production of sugar from beet-root and other substances, sugar-refining, brewing, distillation, the extraction of perfumes, the manufacture of fancy soaps, the preparation of fennel, macaroni, vermicelli, and other processes for the preservation and preparation of food, to which chemical science has been largely applied by our neighbours.

STEAM PLOUGH.

Among the various substitutes for the "peculiar institution," which have been suggested, we now record another, a steam plough:

It will no doubt highly interest your readers to learn that a steam plough, shipped in one of the last Liverpool steamers, and consigned to Messrs. Longstreet, Owen & Co., is at the present moment being shipped on our levee. We earnestly call the attention of our agriculturalists to this importation, which is likely to prove the forerunner of the introduction of an implement in the highest degree calculated to save human and animal labor, and to change and improve our system of cultivation.

It must be surprising to everybody who sees the general introduction of machinery and of steam as motive power, all over the world, and all conditions of life, that the hard, expensive and yet simple work of cultivating the soil, is still left to the slow process of manual labor, and to the simple implements used centuries ago. One of the many reasons which explain this great anomaly is the fact that the first experiments in steam plowing, chiefly made in this country, were based on the principle of working a set of plows or cultivators directly, by a locomotive moving over the field. The power, and therefore the expense, for moving the huge steam horse itself far exceeded the power required for actual cultivation, and so steam plowing was for some time abandoned as a pretty, but a hopeless idea.

But the employment of steel ropes for moving a set of plows, the engines being stationary or moving only along the headlands of the fields, altered the prospects for its introduction. Mr. John Fowler, of Leeds, England, introduced his patent steam plows, based on this principle, not only in England, where some 500 to 600 sets are at present in motion, but chiefly, too, in one of the first cotton-growing countries—next to ours—in the world. Many hundreds of his powerful engines are worked by Arabs and Bedouins, at the present moment, preparing the soil of the Nile valley of Egypt for this year's cotton crop.

One of the chief causes of the acknowledged superiority of the Egyptian cotton is to be found in the large introduction of this system of cultivation, without which deep cultivation, at the present rate of wages, is almost out of reach of the planter.—New Orleans Crescent.

The tonnage of France is 935,535, while Prussia boasts some 1,293,138 tons; thus it will be seen, that in Europe, Prussia is the second commercial power.

ROME.

PROCLAMATION OF THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE TO THE PEOPLE.

(From La Liberte, (Paris) Dec. 21.)

Romans.—At last the French soldier has left Rome—the last foreign flag flies over Italian territory—no proud dominion, no unjust protection troubles it. The spectacle is painful to our oppressors, but it is consoling to us, who, after eighteen years, raise our heads again, and find Rome again mistress of her destiny. May this solemn day imprint itself deeply upon the memory and heart of every Roman who feels his dignity. This day, 14th December, 1866, opens an era, the era which will see, besides free religious magistrates, Rome also free—it also prosperous.

To us, then, O Romans, be the task. Tardy justice replaces in our hands the fate of the country which was no longer ours. The hour is decisive—solemn. The whole universe regards us moved, agitated, by opposing feelings. We, strong in an imprescriptible right, resolve to exercise the rights of the spiritual power, preparing for the great event our minds, our thoughts, and, if necessary, our arms. No vain words—no inconsiderate movements—no isolated agitation. Away from our ranks he who will not bring aid at this solemn moment. The country is rich in courage and civic virtue, and the supreme day will develop them.

It is useless to abandon one's self to empty and inconsiderate manifestations. That would be what its enemies most desire, the dreamers of new foreign intermeddlers, who in great numbers surround us, spy upon us, and oppress us: it is upon them, no doubt, do not doubt it, that the eyes of those who watch over the destinies, rest; but against them it is necessary to be united, disciplined, strong and resolute and at the same time, to await with calmness the moment that separates us from our object. Let us gather, let us clasp hands, and let us rally round the name and glories of Rome. Thus united and compact let us wait.

In the name of the country, let not the least part of our force stray away at this solemn moment. Success is certain. The days of clerical despotism are numbered. Your committee will not let you want advice and action.

THE ROMAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE.
Rome, Dec. 14, 1866.

No Distinction of Color—Radical Insanity.

Thad. Stevens has introduced, and the House of Representatives has agreed to, a resolution for the appointment of a committee to report a bill to establish free schools in the District of Columbia, which shall be open to white and black children alike. Such a bill will be introduced and enacted into a law. It is the determination of the Radicals to break down all barriers to the social and political equalization of the two races. The effect of the proposed school law in this District is very plain. The parents who can afford to do so will send their children to private schools. They will not send their children to schools where whites and blacks are mixed promiscuously. No white parents will send their children to these free schools unless they are too poor to send them to private schools. The consequence will be, that the children of poor parents will have to go without education altogether, or else go to these white and black schools. That will produce social feelings among white children by no means agreeable to the poorer class. Those white children whose parents can afford to send them to a private school will look down upon those white children who are compelled, on account of the poverty of their parents, to go to school with black children. The idea of the Radicals is, that if the children of the two races are brought up in the same school and educated in the same classes, prejudice of color will disappear, so far as such white children are concerned, and that they will grow to manhood and womanhood in that condition. And these whites and blacks will intermarry, and socially mix as if they were all of the same color. The experiment is to be tried on the poor whites, as they are the least capable of resistance. The Radicals would, if they dared and had the power, make it a criminal offense for any teacher of a public or private school, in any State, to refuse admission to his school of the children of colored parents. So far as they can, they mean to do away with all distinctions on account of color.

The Composition of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court, declaring the Milligan military trial illegal, and therefore to be set aside, has been received by some of the extreme and more ignorant radicals with indignation. They are denouncing the Court as a relic of the "pro-slavery period of the republic," and loud calls are made upon Congress to fill it with new judges after the pattern of Chase.

According to the New York World, the following is the Court as at present constituted:

1863—S. P. Chase, Ohio, Chief Justice.
1835—Jas. M. Wayne, Ga.
1845—Samuel Nelson, N. Y.
1846—R. C. Grier, Penn.
1858—Nathan Clifford, Maine.
1862—Noah M. Swayne, Ohio.
1862—David Davis, Ill.
1863—Samuel F. Miller, Iowa.
1863—Stephen J. Field, California.

Of these, the first and four last were appointed by Mr. Lincoln and eight of the nine are Northern men.

THE MEXICAN EXPEDITION.

From the Sentinel, Dec. 22

We do not think that there is any need to enlarge on Mr. Seward's dispatch of the 23d of November. The difference between the Cabinets of the Tulleries and Washington no longer exists. The complete evacuation of Mexico having to be an accomplished fact on the 1st of March, all apprehension of renewed misunderstanding disappears, and the more so if the last dispatches from Washington, published since Mr. Seward's letter, are to be believed, the French Government, far from raising any obstacle to the re-establishment of the Mexican Republic, shows itself disposed to co-operate with the United States in the restoration of that form of Government. Before many months nothing will remain of the Mexican expedition but a solemn warning for those who have the destinies of States in their hands. Public opinion has never ceased to protest against this attempt to raise, at the price of so many sacrifices, a monarchy, destined to fall miserably as soon as France withdraws the support of her finances and her soldiers; that intervention in the interior affairs of the Mexican people has been considered as a derogation from the policy with regard to nationalities which France sustains in Europe. The Executive, however, could not resolve to renounce its enterprise. The force of things at present obliges it to do so. Public sentiment, of which we have so many times made ourselves the organ, was just and wise. It is now to be regretted that attention was not paid to that manifestation the day after the taking of Puebla.

FREEDMEN.

We have nothing but good will for the freedmen. We love to see them enjoy themselves. It was our privilege to labor for their spiritual good before the war, and we feel no disposition to relax our efforts in their behalf. It was a terrible kindness that set them free, and consigned a quarter of a million of them to untimely graves.—Their emancipation is called, the great social phenomenon of the age, if not of the century. There is a greater phenomenon than that. That four millions of slaves should be freed in a day with scarcely an act of violence on their part, is a phenomenon unparalleled in the history of our race. Such a fact is to the whole world an incontestible proof of the mild form of Southern slavery, and of the respect and love which our former slaves felt toward us. They feel still that their former owners are their best friends; and the evidences they give of respect and affection are simple and touching. When we returned to this city, one of the first persons that called to see us was a former slave, and the pleasure of meeting, especially with the children, was as genuine as if a near relative had entered the house. In many portions of the South, the colored people are seeking again their old homes, and settling down on the estates where they were born and bred. Let us be kind to them; let us try in every way to develop their minds and improve their condition.—Richmond Christian Advocate.

THE ENGLISH "REFORM" MOVEMENT.

The rapid strides which have been made by the Reformers in England, during the past few months, since the formation of the League, are well calculated to excite the deepest interest as to the political future of that country. The agitation, which was at first started by the Liberal party for the purpose of extending the franchise moderately, has now passed beyond its control, and has assumed a magnitude and an importance which are startling. In every important town both in England and Scotland branches of the great central have sprung into existence, conducted generally by vigorous and active men, who have their hearts in the work, and who are urged on by personal ambition, to push their cause to a successful issue.

The commercial marine of Prussia, which one year ago consisted of 1,665 vessels, now numbers 10,202 ships.

ZION CHURCH, CHARLESTON.—This church has at length, been, in part, given up to its owners. We informed our readers a few weeks ago that Gen. Howard, Chief of the Freedmen's Bureau, had ordered the Northern Church's missionary to surrender the property; but that the Northern Church, by its missionary, had refused obedience. This missionary, having received from his legal adviser a written opinion to the effect that he could not hope to hold the property by the decision of any tribunal whatever, (as indeed he might have inferred from the Freedmen's Bureau's refusal to countenance the claim,) at length made a virtue of necessity, and surrendered the upper part of the building. This was done several weeks ago, but in compliance with the missionary's request, the trustees, returning good for evil, allowed that missionary to use the church a few Sabbaths more, though greatly against the wishes of a very large part of the colored congregation, who were anxious that the missionary should be summarily ejected. Their beloved pastor, the Rev. Dr. Girardeau, will resume his labors among them next Sunday.

The Northern Church, by its missionary, still retains possession of the basement, under the authority of the Freedmen's Bureau. When that authority shall be withdrawn, July 1, 1867, we may expect to get complete possession of our property. Our experience of the Northern Church's honesty in this case does not warrant the supposition that that Church will relax its grasp upon our property one moment before it shall be forced to do so by some power—physical, not moral—which it dares not resist.—Southern Presbyterian.

RELIEF FOR DISTRESS MINISTERS, FAMILIES AND THE POOR OF SOUTHERN CHURCHES.—The cry for food begins to come up to us in earnest tones from large districts of the South, which have suffered a drouth, and some of them two seasons of drouth, on the back of all the desolations of war. To this cry our Christian brethren of different denominations in this favored region have made preparations to respond. And in Louisville as in various portions of the Commonwealth, committees of benevolent and enterprising citizens have been appointed representing the public at large, to gather and forward food to the famine-stricken regions.

We are gratified to announce in response to numerous inquiries on the subject, that the Executive Committee of Missions of the Synod of Kentucky—acting as they believe in the spirit of the Synod's third resolution on the missionary work—have determined, in their official capacity, as representing the Presbyterians of this highly-favored region, to act as an agency for receiving and disbursing specific contributions of food and other supplies to the destitute families of ministers and to the poor of Southern churches. Desiring to act thoroughly in concert with, and in aid of, the excellent public committee organized in Louisville, they have arranged to ship through the agency of that committee, contributions made for the specific purpose above mentioned; and to turn into the common channel such surplus as they may receive out of general contributions entrusted to them.

A lady who was in the habit of spending a large portion of her time in the society of her neighbors, happened one day to be taken suddenly ill, and sent her husband in great haste for a physician. The husband ran a few rods, but soon returned, exclaiming, "My dear, where shall I find you when I get back?"

An industrious tradesman having taken a new apprentice, awoke him at a very early hour on the first morning, by calling out that the family were sitting down to table. "Thank you," said the boy, as he turned over in bed, to adjust himself for a new nap, "thank you; but I never eat anything during the night."

CHARCOAL FOR FATTENING TURKEYS.—"I have made an experiment," says a writer, "in feeding charcoal to fatten turkeys, and the result surprised me. Four turkeys were confined in a pen and fed on meal, boiled potatoes and oats. Four others, of the same breed, were also, at the same time, confined in a pen and fed on the same articles, but with one pint of very finely pulverized charcoal mixed with their food—mixed meal and potatoes. They had also a plentiful supply of broken charcoal in their pen. The eight were killed on the same day, and there was difference of one and a half pounds in favor of the fowls which had been supplied with the charcoal, they being much the fatter and the meat greatly superior in point tenderness and flavor."

The vast desert of Sahara, whitened by the bones of so many unfortunate travelers who have perished on its inhospitable sands, is likely, it is said, to become rich and fertile before many ages. The only cause of its sterility has been the absence of water, which will be supplied by artesian wells. Every day new ones are produced by the multiplication of these wells, which supply vast quantities of water. So says the London Scientific Review.

FARM AND GARDEN. ROTATION OF CROPS.

Many years ago, Chaptal, the celebrated French agricultural chemist, laid down five distinct propositions, in which the effects produced by constant cultivation of the soil were stated very briefly but very clearly; we propose to recapitulate his points and to make a running commentary on each of them as may serve at least, to arrest attention, and perhaps may prove suggestive to some of our readers.

A system of cropping which, by a well devised rotation, shall restore to the soil, by the use of certain crops, at least a part of these constituents of which it has been exhausted by certain other crops, constitutes the basis of all good husbandry.

Chaptal's propositions are—1st "All plants exhaust the soil."

If Chaptal had said all "cultivated" plants exhaust the soil, his remarks would have been entirely correct. When soils are in their virgin state, or where on soils thrown out of cultivation, a secondary growth of wood springs up, the process of exhaustion is arrested, and the fertilizing process is at work. The reason for this is, that the annual decay of vegetables—on the prairies, for instance—enriches the soil, because a portion of the plant food is derived from the atmosphere. A similar result must follow, though more slowly, where on once cultivated and partially exhausted fields a new growth of wood springs up. In this case, the annual droppings of the leaves and pine shatters assist in restoring, at least in some measure, the fertility of the soil, and certainly prevent any further exhaustion of it. The value of crops that shade the ground, in contradiction to hoed crops, is by the examples just cited exemplified and illustrated by nature herself.

2d "All plants do not exhaust the soil equally."

This fact, the experience of every farmer has demonstrated. Analysis shows that 100 parts of the ashes of the grain of Indian corn contain 28 parts of potash, 13 parts of magnesia, and 53 parts of phosphoric acid—and also that 100 parts of the ashes of the stalks and leaves contain 35 parts of potash, 10 parts of lime and 8 parts of phosphoric acid. The drain, therefore, upon the potash, soda, lime and phosphates in the soil, is very great. The same may be said of wheat and tobacco. Oats, rye and barley exhaust the soil, in rather lesser proportions, and clover, turnips, the leguminous plants and the grasses, least of all.

4th. "All plants do not restore to the soil the same quality or quantity of manure."

Chaptal here means only the roots and refuse of plants after the crop is taken off. But the reasoning is equally applicable in regard to green crops turned under. There are some plants which draw a large portion of nourishment from the atmosphere—as clover, for instance. There are others—we may cite wheat as an illustration—which draw comparatively little from that source. A green crop of clover turned under would, therefore furnish to the soil not only the constituents the crop has drawn from it, but also those it had derived from the atmosphere, and by its system of tap roots, much nourishment that had been otherwise locked up in the subsoil. The best illustration of this is the fact that whilst the ashes of an acre of wheat, including the grain and straw, do not weigh more than 90 pounds—the ashes of one acre of clover will weigh 283 pounds—and the latter are principally composed of the most valuable constituents of the soil. From the above statement it necessarily follows that—

5th. "All plants do not exhaust the soil equally."

This we have endeavored to show is really the case, and upon this acknowledged fact the value of a judicious system of rotation is based.

Chaptal's deductions are as follows:

That a long succession of crops exhaust the soil. That the amount of annual exhaustion depends on the nature of the crop grown. That tap or spindle rooted crops—clover, turnips, carrots, beets, etc.—ought to succeed the running and superficial roots—wheat, oats, barley corn, etc. That the same crop should not be grown too frequently on the same field. That no two grain crops—say wheat, and oats—should follow each other in succession. That the losses sustained by the soil from crops that draw their nourishment chiefly from that source, should be counteracted by adequate supplies of manure, and, finally, that when the cultivation of cereals has been carried to such an extent that the soil shows signs of exhaustion, resort must be had to those crops—clover, peas, turnips, leguminous plants and the grasses—that tend to ameliorate the soil and restore to it at least a portion of the fertility it has lost.

The Advocate to be Stopped.

Subscribers will not fail to remember that their ADVOCATE will cease to come to them unless they renew their subscriptions. We shall be sorry to part with them. Please call on your pastor at once, or write us by the next mail, inclosing three dollars. We most earnestly desire all the subscribers to stand by us. The ADVOCATE is a Church paper, represents all the interests of the Church as no outside paper can do. Stick to your own paper, and if you occasionally desire to see others, borrow one. "Excepting only the Bible and the devotions at the family altar, there is no greater power for good in the home circle than the religious newspaper. The parent who provides it for his family, or the pastor who secures its introduction into the homes of his people, accomplishes a good work, the influences of which are too precious for calculation."

"THE PRESBYTERIAN INDEX" AND "THE CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH" are among the best papers which come to this office. They are not only a strength to the Presbyterian Church but to the whole Church; and are fighting the same battle against the same foe with ourselves. That new type of Protestantism which announces a political unity, and which is ready to harmonize all ecclesiastical and doctrinal differences in order to combine in great force and numbers at the polls, is to be found equally in the Northern Methodist and the Northern Presbyterian Churches.

The Index is a large sheet ably edited, and full of the very best reading for the family.—Price $5, Office, No. 12 South Royal st., Mobile, and No. 28 Carondelet street.

THE SOUTHERN CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE comes to us in greatly improved style, large and full of good matter: original contributions, ample cash receipts and other signs of prosperity. We rejoice in the success of Messrs. J. W. Burke & Co.

This sheet now vies in size with that of the Nashville Advocate. "They stretch their arms like seas and grasp in all the shore."

SUNDAY SCHOOL VISITOR, M. E. Church, South. In beautiful style and most gracefully does this old friend enter again upon the cheerful work of supplying our Sabbath-School children with news and Sunday reading. It is an improvement upon the old Visitor in point of press-work, paper and woodcuts. Right bravely does our Agent at the Publishing House move forward. We hope that he will adopt for his motto, "Festina Lente." The times will admit of it. Many enthusiastic friends who do not have "to pay the printer," would have been entertained with the same half-interested concern which more than anything else has characterized the recent vote.

THE NEW VOLUME.

Our patrons can see at a glance that we have been in dock, and are newly rigged for another long voyage. During the past year a good Providence has favored us with many kind friends and propitious gales. Sounding along for months, with some fear and extreme caution, we at last boldly ventured out into the shoreless deep, and overcame without serious disaster the fifty-two weeks of labor there are in a single year. Have our subscribers derived any solid advantage from the reading of this CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE? We trust that preachers and people have been encouraged by the view which its columns have afforded of the condition of the Church generally, and specially of the life, unity, and strength of our own Southern Methodism. It did some service during the General Conference, by spreading the glad tidings of that glorious session. Some goodly men think that since that time it has done a corresponding disservice, by withholding a firm support from the constitutional questions of Lay Delegation and Change of Name. But we regret nothing on that score, and believe that the position of this ADVOCATE is still that of four-fifths of the members of our Church, in regard to those momentous changes. It cannot possibly be the mind of those even who advocate the introduction of the lay-element into our economy, to overwhelm the clerical element; which the plan passed by the General Conference in effect does, and which we greatly fear will pass the Annual Conferences by the requisite majorities. Whatever may be the final result, we derive satisfaction from the fact that these measures have been rejected by a large proportion of the Ministers owning and supporting this paper. The wholesale way in which these questions have been swallowed by not a few of the Southern Conferences must ever be a wonder in the history of Legislation, and by and by to none greater than to themselves. Without discussion, without inquiry, without deliberation they have passed these propositions to the last man, as promptly as a flock of sheep would clear a gap. Grave questions, before the war used to be sifted, weighed, and, from the constitution of the human intellect, they usually divided Conferences and Legislatures into two very nearly equal parts, and were carried or lost by a comparatively slight preponderance of reason and argument. By this process propositions were cleared of crudeness, their possible effects came into view, and the action of the body became as intentional as definite. But it would seem as if in State affairs, men were incapable of a thoughtful legislation directly after a period of war. Either individuality has not as yet sufficiently recovered from the over-riding aggregating force of that mere physical condition which merged the one in the many; or, men are too intent upon recovering their own personality and property to care much about general legislation. Whatever the cause, nothing is more patent than the indifference with which these most weighty constitutional questions have been received by our Church. And we regard it as a good providence that there were just now no more of them presented to the Annual Conferences. Probably a proposition to have twelve new Bishops, to have each Conference a Diocese, by giving each Bishop so much to do within its bounds as to preclude all other work, to do away with Presiding Elders, to lengthen the pastoral term indefinitely, or any other changes equally momentous, would have been entertained with the same half-interested concern which more than anything else has characterized the recent vote.

We are well satisfied before conforming our Church to a republican model to wait for a better model. Republics do not by their constitution elevate the people: they only do at best use those elevating forces which may be found in them, supplied from without. The rulers of a republic are but exponents, and cannot be better than the people which compose it. Whereas the business of the Church, like that of the school-master or the parent, is to teach and elevate, and its constitution must of necessity conform to that of the family or the school.

The representative system implies the very opposite of that state of things which occasioned the institution of Christ's Church and the Christian Ministry. The resolution of forces, and a corresponding strife of who shall be greatest, compose the spirit and the wisdom of that system. The machinery of elections, and the claims of rival candidates have been and we fear will ever continue to be, a source of mischief in this ambitious and weak world. The Saviour "girded himself" and knelt at the feet of his Disciples to correct this evil, and to inculcate an opposite principle upon the Church. That the very organization of a Church government may foster this evil, it is evident, or may on the other hand, to a great degree obviate it.

By the providence of God an adjustment of forces most favorable to unambitious action exists in the system of Government which grew out of the ministry and the doctrines of John Wesley, and the early Legislation of Methodism in America. For widely, free, simple, compact form what can be superior to Mr. Wesley's Episcopal type of Church Government: and this is the type which we have. For weight and velocity, for connectional strength, and missionary movement it has never yet been surpassed. These happy combinations, depend upon it, have something more than human wisdom in them, and ought not to be touched adventurously. We are not warranted in rudely taking hold of the ark because the oxen stumble.

But is there no way of introducing into our system the new, without destroying the old? If not, there can be no progress, but only and endless experiment. How this can be accomplished is the question. We believe that the department of Church Extension, Mission Fields, Education, Sabbath-Schools, and Church Literature offers a field sufficiently vast to employ and exhaust all the energy of the lay-element in our Church; and sufficiently important to demand a distinct Conference organization. The Monthly Meetings and the District Meetings seem to be solving this problem without touching the structure of the Church.

It has not been six months since twenty-four Conferences of the Methodist Protestant Church, nine Conferences of the Wesleyan Methodist, and two independent congregations of Methodists met in Cincinnati to coalesce, and gain strength by union. Roman Catholicism is to be met, and the immense open country of Paganism is to be occupied, and they equally demand connectional, organized strength, all that may be consistent with the fullest freedom of a good scriptural conscience. Our Church therefore needs to preserve all its inherent and acquired organic strength and activity, while calling into play those great resources, as yet scarcely touched, which are to be found in its thousands of educated and sanctified laymen. We feel confident, if by the Providence of God the present plan be defeated, that in four years the mature thought of the Church will evolve an accurate, well-digested law incorporating lay representation.

INDEPENDENT MISSIONARY.

The original communication inserted in the "Child's Corner," signed "Independent Missionary," is from Rev. P. Bagly, who has spent years in China and in Japan. He moves on an original plan—without purse or scrip, and takes up no collections! It is a light method of traveling, but has, in his case, been a successful one: which speaks well for the general benevolence of the world, and, what is more important, evidences its real interest in all genuinely unselfish persons and enterprises. Mr. B. is still a very young man. He is found in the South upon what doubtless seemed to be an "open door" for good; the enlightening and christianizing the Blacks. He did not know possibly that the best-judges of what is civilized, what is christianly, of refinement, and of intelligence, the New England statesman and the New England divine, have pronounced our colored people to be equal to the very best; worthy of being Legislators every man of them. And as for their religious condition, he probably did not know that a larger proportion of them belongs to the church than that of any other people in the world.

Mr. B. has been much pleased with the opportunities proffered him for preaching to them; and we doubt not the visit of the Missionary was a great treat to the colored people. We bid him God speed in his universal apostleship.

WORK OF GRACE IN MEMPHIS IN THE CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—We are pleased to learn that more than seventy persons have already united with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of Memphis, of which Rev. C. A. Davis, D. D., is pastor. In this meeting, at which these persons were added to the Church, which is still in progress, the pastor is assisted by the Rev. J. W. Point-dexter of that city.

NOT WILLING TO GO.—At the last meeting of the Synod of New Jersey, one of the officers of the Executive Committee of Foreign Missions made the remarkable statement, "that, for the last eighteen months, not a single person from any of our seminaries, not one from Princeton, not one from Alleghany, had made an application to that body to be sent as a missionary to any part of the pagan or Mohammedan world."

A NEW KIND OF POTATO.—Among the Christmas extemporizations by the Methodists of New York city, was a big potato, green at the core, and holding $500, given by the Washington street Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, to their pastor, Rev. A. S. Hunt.

The Missionary Anniversary of Wesley Chapel is to be held on the 20th instant; Dr. McClinton is to preach in the morning; Rev. J. H. Vincent is to address the Sunday-school Anniversary in the afternoon. At the evening meeting Chief Justice Chase or Speaker Colfax will preside.

The Bishops of Madras, Calcutta and Bombay, have issued an address in which they say the number of Christian converts in India, Burmah and Ceylon is 213,483; and the number of English and American missionaries is 541. The children at the mission schools within the same bounds are 97,575. The number in all the schools is 500,000.

The Spanish religious journals recommend the re-establishment of the inquisition in Spain, as the sole means of saving society.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

TANON, or the Richmond collection of sacred music, by R. McIntosh. New York, F. J. Huntington & Co., Broome street. T. L. White & Co., New Orleans.

The author was an officer in the army of Virginia. He has collected here the psalmody peculiar to the South and South-West, besides that of the great masters in general use. Many original pieces are inserted in this collection.

NICODEMUS WITH JESUS, by Rev. J. M. P. Otis. Philadelphia: James S. Glaxton, 1214 Chesnut street—1867: 42 mo.

The work is the result of a Pastor's Bible Class. He began to unfold this rich passage of Scripture, and the work grew upon his hands and his soul. The Holy Spirit opened his understanding, and he now preaches to the world the thoughts of his closet upon the great central truth of Scripture, the new birth.

✓ CONCISE HISTORY OF THE INTRODUCTION OF PROTESTANTISM INTO MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTH-WEST, by Rev. John G. Jones, St. Louis: P. M. Pinkard & Co., No. 510 Pine street. 1866.

In this work we have a great deal of valuable material for the future historian preserved to the Church. Its minute and faithful statement of persons and acts will interest both ministers and members of the Methodist Church in the South. It is a capital thing.

METHODIST QUARTERLY REVIEW, January, 1867. 200 Mulberry street, New York. Rev. D. D. Whedon, D. D., Editor.

The two articles, "Hurst's History of Rationalism," by Dr. McClinton, and "Adam Clarke as a Preacher," by Rev. Samuel Dunn, are alone worth the price of the Quarterly.

The Editor has placed this Review fairly by the side of the very best in this or any country. His own department of it is full of sensible scholarly criticism such as could only come from a full and accurate mind. He is not afraid to think for himself, excepting in one department; in all else he is refreshingly original, highly instructive and suggestive. It is painful to see such a mind turning aside to throw a sop to Cerberus. While standing at the grave of a friend, he must drop a tear for—Africa! Not the "Albert Nianza" Africa, at zero; but Africa out of the "sum of all villainies," rising resplendent, admirable, sublime, already capable of the highest affairs of Church and State. "O Africa!"

THE SOUTHERN BOYS' AND GIRLS' MONTHLY. White and Howard, Main street, No. 1011—Richmond, Va. Rev. E. T. Baird and Prof. W. Logan Baird, Editors—$1 50 a year.

As its title indicates, a pleasant monthly for the entertainment of the young people.

AMERICAN EDUCATIONAL MONTHLY, devoted to popular instruction and literature. Jan. 1867. J. W. Schermerhorn & Co., 430 Broome street, New York. $1 50 per annum.

Contents: German Schools, John Boyd, Radical defect in Education, Pedagogical Laws, Culture of Imagination, Prize Poem—a Dialogue, Oceanic Phenomena, Respect due to Pupils, Out of School, Rare case of Courage, A School Music Book-Wanted, A few Words, Editorial Correspondence—Intelligence, Current Publications.

A most excellent and readable Monthly is this; one deserving a wide circulation, adhering strictly to the business in hand.

THE AMERICAN FARMER. Worthington & Lewis, 52 S. Gay st., Baltimore. Price $2 per year.

The various systems of Field Rotation. Three, Four, Five and Seven Field, are fully discussed in the present and previous numbers. These and the several articles on "Clover Culture," "Our Homes," "The value of our Lands," &c., in recent numbers, indicate the thoroughly practical character of the "Old Farmer." While the large amount of matter on Fruit Growing, gathered from the best sources show how well the "Pioneer

Journal keeps itself at the head of the Agricultural and Horticultural progress of the day. In all its leading departments of Field, Orchard and Garden cultivation, and Stock growing, whether in its original or selected matter, The Farmer shows a direction which is at once practical and scientific.

Its very apparent sympathy with Southern interests has caused the American Farmer to lose favor with a certain class of Northern readers and advertisers, and it deserves therefore, on every account, the support of Southern people.

MUSICAL PIONEER. 50 cents per annum in advance. 459 Broome street, New York.

Each number contains new pieces of music, and some very sensible musical matter.

VICKS' ILLUSTRATED GUIDE FOR THE FLOWER GARDEN, and Catalogue of Seeds, with plain and full directions for sowing seed, transplanting, and after culture. James Viek, Importer of Choice Flower and Vegetable Seeds, Rochester, New York: is a pamphlet of 88 pages full of excellent wood-cuts of flowers, and much horticultural information.

PHILOSOPHY OF THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH, from the times of Christ until the Present. St. Louis, P. M. Pinkard, 78 and 80 Pine street—12 mo.

As the size of the volume indicates, this is a rapid resume of Church History. It puts upon record the War-history of the Northern Churches, which it were well to preserve for future reference. The style is sprightly, the thought is progressive.

FRENCH PROTESTANT MISSION IN AFRICA.—The Paris Missionary Society has been deeply tried by the sudden death, by fever, in Senegal, of a most prominent young missionary, M. Langa. The South African Mission is still under heavy trial: some of the expelled missionaries have, however, visited their people, and found them steady in the truth. The station where the printing press works has remained untouched, its topographical position having, in the hands of God, prevented the inroads of the Boers.

The new Church Almanac gives the following statistics of the Episcopal Church in this country, including the Southern States: whole number of parishes, 2,305; whole number of clergy, 2,530; total membership, 161,224; contributions the past year, $3,051,667.

Considerable excitement has been caused at Dubuque by the adhesion of Rev. Father Keiny, a Roman Catholic priest, to the Methodist Church.

The Christian Witness, Episcopal, says: "Ninety years ago we had one clergyman to every ten thousand of the people; now we have only one to every fifteen thousand, and this discrepancy is increasing. The past two years the additions have not filled the places made by death and disability."

Mr. Norris, of the Manhattan Mission, reports among the Burmans of that city a condition of unusual hopefulness, an uncommon readiness to hear the word, and in the native preachers, new courage to labor.

THE WATCHMAN SUSPENDED.

We are sorry to note that this able journal has, by the want of money, been compelled to a suspension. We have entertained our readers with many a good thing clipped from its columns. The cause of this failure is attributable to the continued troubles of the whole country, which to-day is financially in a worse condition than it was one year ago. The Editor, Dr. Deems, says in a final address to its subscribers:

"If upon a review of the year, I could discover that I had left anyone any thing demanded by my position, I should have cause for remorse. If the paper had failed to establish itself in the affections of its readers, I should have cause for regret. These do not exist. Just at this juncture, when the stockholders are compelled to suspend, THE WATCHMAN elicits the warmest encomiums and the strongest expressions of desire for its continuance. It has really given me a strange kind of pleasant pain during the past six weeks to receive letters from so many people in different parts of the country, expressing their admiration of THE WATCHMAN. But these do not pay the weekly bills."

Yes, "admiration" and "encouragement" do a publisher very little good, unless they are pronounced so as to reach the compositor and the pressman. The conception of a religious and literary journal, published in the city of New York, with a Southern heart in it, was a good, we may say a bold and great one. Pity that it could not be permanently realized. Personally in, a pecuniary sense, and may be in some other respects, a man had better be a year behind the times than a month before them. The old adage, better be fifteen minutes too soon than one too late, was hastily conceived. Though it did seem as if the times were propitious to the enterprise of the Watchman, and, but for the failure in the great staple of the South, it would most likely have succeeded.

Common Back.—A correspondent of the St. Louis and Louisville Advocate writing from Kentucky, says: "Our colored members have for more than a year been in a very unsettled condition. There are three distinct parties in the field who wish to proselyte them, and if not to 'glory in their flesh,' at least to glory in the number of their names. Their old friends, the Baptists, still invite them down into the pond or the creek. The Zion and Bethel Black Methodist Churches each claim them, and the great Methodist Episcopal Church of the North is making mighty efforts to obtain permission to count their names. Several congregations have changed their Church relations two or three times, and are back again under the care of their best friends—the ministry and membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. If we properly carry into execution our Conference resolutions, I believe a large majority of our colored members will finally settle down in the happy enjoyment of their privileges and rights as members of our Church."

TAKE YOUR OWN PAPER.—The W. Chris. Advocate says: "This is the true policy for the Church. Every Methodist should have the official paper of his own locality. No other paper will keep him in perpetual sympathy with his own denomination. The Conferences, anniversaries, institutions, revivals, deaths, and incidents of his own region, can only be familiar to him through such an organ. The sentiments of the master-minds, in his vicinity, are there published; and hence it is only by reading its columns that he can lay his hand, as it were, upon the heart of the Church, and feel its pulsations. It is wisdom, therefore, for the members of our Church to prefer their own paper."

Bishop Doggett.—Bishop Doggett of Richmond, Va., is expected to dedicate the new Episcopal Methodist Church on Holland st., next Sunday the 6th instant. The Bishop has kindly consented to preach morning and evening. Rev. Dr. Schon will preach in the afternoon at three o'clock. The Church is a neat and well finished edifice, and will be an ornament to that section of the city. Our friends of that young and enterprising charge deserve great credit for their zeal and liberality. Rev. E. Welty, the pastor, has devoted his time and energies to the successful prosecution of the good work entrusted to his care.—Episcopal Methodist.

LATEST NEWS.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 14.—Associate Justice Field, to-day, delivered the opinion of the United States Supreme Court in the Missouri test oath cases.

John A. Cummins, a Roman Catholic priest, who was indicted for preaching and teaching without taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution of that State, being plaintiff in error, the Court decided that the test oath in this case is unconstitutional, being in the nature of punishment without trial, and is in its character ex post facto and as a bill of attainder. The judgment of the Court is reversed, with directions that the plaintiff shall depart without delay.

Associate Justice Field also delivered an opinion of the Court in the ex parte cases of Garland and Marr, who having taken a part in the rebellion, ask to be readmitted to practice. The Court holds that as a statute imposes a punishment which may not have been punishable at the time the offence was committed, it is in its nature an ex post facto law. Attorneys are not officers of the Court, and hold their office during their good behavior. The Court is not the register of the edicts of any other power. The applicants obtained a pardon from the President, which relieves them from consequences of offence, and makes the citizen in the eye of the law what he was before it was committed. Congress cannot be fettered by legislative restriction. It followed that the prayer of the petitioner must be granted, and also the prayer of Mr. Marr. The rule which requires attorneys to take the test oath, must be rescinded, and order is made accordingly. Associate Justice Miller for himself; Chief Justice Chase and Associates Swayne and Davis read a dissenting opinion.

The Committee on Territories have instructed Ashley to report his amendment to the bill to establish a civil government in North Carolina, as a substitute for Stevens's now before the House.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 14.—The proceedings of the House to-day exhibit an unusual amount of vindictiveness towards the President. Loan's impeachment resolution came up. Mr. Loan indulged in a violent speech, charging the President with complicity in the assassination of Lincoln. He was called to order by Mr. Hale, (Rep.) of New York. The Speaker sustained Mr. Loan in the use of his violent language. An appeal was taken from the Speaker's ruling, and the appeal was laid on the table by a majority vote.

Loan continued his tirade but no vote was reached and the resolution went over for another week.

We learn from a Spanish paper that the Cathedral clergy in Spain amounts to no less than 1777 individuals, (people that consume, but do not produce anything,) whose yearly income amounts to 1,224,742. Then there are besides the sacerdotal body, amounting to 21,357 persons, whose annual income is stated to be $3,902,402. Should we not pity the poor Spaniards?

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16.—The subject of reconstruction was discussed in the House to-day. Mr. Stephens's bill to reorganize the Southern State governments being brought up for action, that bill recognizes the existing State governments as valid until altered, and authorized a convention of delegates to be elected by all male citizens 21 years of age, in each state, to form a Constitution which, if approved by Congress and ratified by the people, shall take effect. No Constitution shall be presented to Congress which does not extend equal rights to all races.

Mr. Payne, of Wisconsin, opened the debate by a very bitter attack upon Mr. Stevens, for proposing to recognize the existing of States governments as valid. He denounced him as skirting the guilt and crime of the President, and as false to every principle of liberty and justice.

Mr. Payne is a Radical of the new extreme type, and this attack upon the Radical leader was wholly unexpected, and Mr. Stevens did not receive it with entire complacency. Whether Mr. Payne's sentiments are shared by any considerable number of the Radicals, I do not know; but Mr. Ashley's substitute for Mr. Stevens's bill proposes to declare all the laws and all the acts of the existing Governments null and void, and this will probably receive the support of the extreme Radical wing.

Mr. Payne's language towards Mr. Stevens was as severe and unmeasured in its denunciations as is often heard in Congress. This speech was followed by one equally severe upon the principles and provisions of Mr. Stevens's bill, but much more respectful towards him personally, from Mr. Bingham, of Ohio, who made one of the most eloquent and effective speeches heard in the present Congress.

He denounced this bill as violating the spirit of the proposed constitutional amendment, as at war with the pledge which that amendment virtually holds out to the South, and which received the support of the Reconstruction Committee, Mr. Stevens himself included.

He declared his belief that the rebel States had forfeited all claim to share in the national Government by their rebellion, and that all the powers of government rested in the hands of loyal States, three-fourths of which might ratify any constitutional amendments they pleased, nor could the Supreme Court interfere with this, because the question was political, and not judicial, and therefore beyond their jurisdiction; but these States are still States within the Union, and Mr. Stevens's bill proposed to blot out rights which still belong to them as such; their people were still citizens, and entitled to the rights of citizens; but the bill declares that they have lost their citizenship, which can only be restored to them by the action of Congress.

Mr. Bingham denounced the attempt to treat the Southern States as conquered provinces, and their people as conquered subjects, and urged a policy of magnanimity and generosity as alone worthy of any Christian people. He maintained that this Government exists only through the action of State Governments, and protests against the evident purpose to crush the States and render them the mere subjects of Federal power.

Mr. Bingham is one of the ablest debaters in Congress. He speaks with uninterrupted fluency and with great rapidity. His language is scholarly, his sentences polished, and his whole manner graceful and earnest.

Mr. Dawson followed, when the debate closed for the day.

WRECK OF THE STEAMER PLATE VALLEY. On the evening of Thursday, Jan. 17, this steamer struck the wreck of a gunboat, between Memphis and Vicksburg, and sunk in three minutes. About 100 lives were lost.

FROM MEXICO.

GALVESTON, Jan. 17.—Flake's Batista has Mexican news to the 15th, which was received this morning by the United States dispatch boat Black Bird, Capt. Cole.

Escobedo and the entire force left Monterey on the 27th for San Luis in hot chase for a fight with the French.

Cortina is reported about twelve leagues from Matamoros, maintaining for Juarez. Barrozaral, commanding at Matamoros, has succeeded in raising by loans, some money to pay off Cortina's troops, and sent it to him on the 12th inst. This will probably quiet them.

No new movement from Ortega. Official information has been received that the Liberals occupied San Luis Potosi, Zacatecas, Aguascalientes, Pressimo, and Guadalupe, and Queretaro.

Canales is at Victoria, Mexico, but is lame.

A light is expected to take place between the forces of Mejia and the Liberals, somewhere near Dolores Hidalgo.

A grand banquet was given Escobedo previous to his marching from Monterey on the French.

Naranjo's headquarters are at Mier.

Bastante has issued a proclamation in favor of Juarez, full of bitter language against Maximilian.

Great preparations were making at San Luis for the reception of Juarez, who was expected to make that city his capital.

Ortega's faction is reported to be gaining ground.

Cortina has officially announced to Berrozaral that Tampico, Tula and Victoria had proclaimed for Ortega, who was occupying them with military forces.

Circular of Marshal Bazaine from the Rio Grande Courier of January 15th: The Observador publishes in an extra the following news by private letters from San Luis Potosi: We are informed in consequence of the retreat of the Imperial forces toward the capital, where they have received orders to concentrate, Escobedo must have commenced his march on Queretaro, which was to be evacuated. Marshal Bazaine has issued the following circular: Expeditionary Corps of Mexico, Headquarters Staff No. 354, 3d Cabinet. Circular to all Mexican corps relative to the soldiers of the French Nationality. The Marshal commanding-in-chief has received a telegram from Paris dated the 13th instant, expressing the intention of the French Government to return to France, not only the foreign legion, but all the soldiers of the French nationality who were formerly authorized to enrol themselves into the service of the Mexican Government, and who are actually among several army corps of the Mexican army. However, if any of these soldiers desire to remain in the service of Mexico, they are authorized to do so, and to remain in the corps to which they actually belong. As to the French, whatever is their actual rank in the Mexican army, officers, non-commissioned officers or privates, manifesting a desire of discontinuing to serve in Mexico, those who are yet attached to the French corps, will be transferred in the foreign legion, where they will have their former rank; as to the others, they will be returned to their country at the cost of the French Government. Consequently there will be made in each Mexican corps a nominal report of all Frenchmen serving in said corps, which report will be forwarded to the Marshal Commanding, after each soldier will have written opposite his name the action by him voluntarily taken, if he is determined or not to remain in the Mexican service. Soldiers taking the first determination will join themselves to the nearest French detachment at the first secure occasion which will offer itself.

Marshal BAZAINE, Commander-in-Chief.

Copies of this circular were forwarded to Gen. Mejia, December 18, to be enforced immediately.

BAPTIST LIBERALITY.—The New York Examiner enumerates several recent instances of liberality among Baptists in endowing literary institutions. The first named is that of Mathew Vassar, of Poughkeepsie, who has given nearly five hundred thousand dollars for the establishment of a college for young ladies. Gardner Colby, of Boston, has given fifty thousand dollars to Waterville College, Maine, seeking also other donations of equal amount. He also gave half that sum towards the erection of a noble building for the Theological Seminary at Newton, Mass. Brown University is receiving an endowment of two or three hundred thousand, largely from Baptists in Rhode Island and elsewhere. Messrs. Colgate & Trevor, of New York, have given seventy-five thousand to Madison University. A gift of twenty-five thousand dollars by Tracy H. Harris, of New York, has secured to Rochester University a subscription of a hundred thousand. To which John F. Rathbone has added twenty-five thousand for the library, and this was followed up by a subscription of one hundred thousand to the Rochester Theological Seminary. The brethren in Pennsylvania have just added one hundred thousand to the endowment of Lehigh University. Much has also been done for the Douglass University at Chicago, and Shurtleff College at Alton.

PRESTANTISM IN TAHITI.—Though Polish priests and French brandy were forced upon the simple natives of this island at the mouth of the canon, it is encouraging to know that the Christian work commenced by the London Missionary Society has not been destroyed, but is still energetically carried forward by the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society. There are in Tahiti and its dependencies 37 native Protestant parishes, with 1,507 pupils in schools, and 3,396 communicants. Queen Pomare and nearly all the people adhere to the Protestant faith. The decree making it compulsory to teach the French language in the native schools has been revoked, so that the native teachers who were compelled to resign have regained possession of the schools. In January, 1865, a Society for the promotion of primary knowledge among the Protestant schools was founded at the Queen's residence, and her husband was appointed president.—United Presbyterian.

From the Baton Rouge Weekly Gazette & Comet we learn that on Christmas Eve the ladies of the Episcopal Church inaugurated a "Christmas Tree" laden with choice presents for the children of their Sunday School, and on Christmas night a similar proceeding took place in the Methodist Church, under the auspices of the ladies of that denomination. We happened to be present on that occasion and were delighted at the happy style in which the whole affair was gotten up and managed. The Rev. Mr. Lightfield led off as master of ceremonies in dispensing the gifts, and discharged his duties in a highly satisfactory manner.

CITY NEWS.

The fact that the stock for a railroad between this point and Mobile has been taken by highly responsible parties, has taken us quite by surprise. The road is called the New Orleans, Mobile & Chattanooga Railroad. It will go round Lake Pontchartrain, by the Coast watering-places, to Mobile. This will complete the only link wanting in the Atlantic railroads between this city and Boston. It will add greatly to the value of the Lake Shore watering places, and will improve the accommodating spirit of the Pontchartrain Railroad and of the Lake steamers.

Last week the Merchants' Exchange Company of New Orleans celebrated the opening of the Institution, in one of the basement rooms of the Moresque building, which will be used as an exchange until the apartments specially assigned to them in the National Bank of Louisiana, now being erected on Common street, are completed, which will be in about three months, when Change will be held in that handsome building.

The celebration was to have commenced at twelve o'clock, but owing to some unlooked-for delay did not open until a few minutes before one, when Mr. Charles Briggs, president of the association, called the assemblage to order. Something like four hundred gentlemen were present, members of the association and invited guests. Very rarely has there been such a gathering of the wealth and intelligence of New Orleans. Every class of the community was represented, including bankers, underwriters and brokers, as well as merchants and members of the bar and the press.

OBITUARIES.

Died at his residence in Pike county, Miss., Nov. 26th, 1866, HARDY THOMPSON, an old and worthy member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. He was born in Georgia, Feb. 5th, 1802, and came to Mississippi with his parents in 1818. After attaining the age of majority, he married Miss Nancy McMorris, in Amite county, where they first settled, but in a few years they removed to Pike county, where he died. They both became consistent members of the M. E. Church when quite young, and ever after endeavored to walk in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless.

By patient industry and economy they acquired a fine estate, in the enjoyment of which they were living, until it was well nigh ruined by the results of the late war.

Brother Thompson was a true friend and liberal supporter of the Church of his early love. Her illustrious pastors were always welcome to the hospitalities of his household, and their wants often relieved by his unostentatious liberality. Hundreds—yes, thousands—will ever remember the princely munificence with which he usually supported a large tent at the Camp-meetings within his reach. It was at these annual meetings that he seemed to be in his most congenial element; and sometimes on these occasions he would indulge the emotions of his holy and triumphant joy until the outer man was well nigh exhausted. But the good man is now gone to rest with the saluted dead. The purposes of God have been accomplished. He had attained the goal of his earthly purify, and has been transferred to the Church triumphant. He has left his wife and children the inheritance of a "good name, rather to be chosen than great riches." The writer of this brief tribute to the memory of the honored dead, became acquainted with brother and sister Thompson about forty years ago, and many have been the pleasant and profitable hours we have spent together when we have been permitted to meet in our earthly pilgrimage. May our christian fellowship so happily begun, and so long continued on earth be perpetuated in heaven! May God abundantly bless all the children of my dear old friend, and whatever may be their fortunes on earth, may they all meet him in heaven!

J. G. JONES.

Fayette, Miss., Dec. 26th, 1866.

MARTHA F. MYERS, wife of C. W. Myers, and daughter of Thomas and Sally Tolson, was born the 13th of Dec. 1827, in North Carolina; and at an early age removed with her parents to Alabama, and from thence to Mississippi, and she departed this life the 23rd of Nov. 1866. At the early age of thirteen years she embraced religion, having experienced a change of heart, and united herself to the Baptist Church, of which she remained an humble, devoted and worthy member until the close of life. On the 20th of Oct. 1863, she was united in marriage to C. W. Myers, with whom she lived in perfect harmony and affection till called away by death. As a Christian, she was devoted, liberal and zealous; as a friend, kind and social; as a mother, tender and affectionate; and as a step mother she excelled. As a mistress, indulgent, and as a companion she united all the qualities requisite to constitute in the fullest sense a good wife.

During a protracted and painful illness she was always resigned, and often spoke of her approaching dissolution with composure, and frequently expressed the liveliest sense of the smiles of her Saviour. She breathed her last in hope and faith. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.

NEW SOUTHERN MUSIC BOOK.

Just published

TABOR,

Or the Richmond Collection of Sacred Music.

By J. MCINTOSH, of Virginia.

The attention of Choirs and Musical Societies generally is respectfully asked for this new and popular collection of Church Music. Its author, for four years an officer in the Confederate Army, composed many pieces in moments snatched during his marching and counter-marching. The dirge at the funeral of Gen. T. J. Jackson (Stone- wall) May 17, 1863, was from his pen, and is included in this collection.

Says the Richmond Virgin: "The writer is well known throughout the South as an author of the highest excellence; a musical reputation rarely attained—at the head of Church Music, no one disputing the position with him, and besides is, and ever has been, one of us."

Says the Star (Richmond, S. C.) Express: "After a careful examination of Tabor, we have no hesitation in pronouncing it a Musical Gem. Its original compositions give the work a distinctive character, while the selections embrace those good old tunes which have come down from our fathers as an invaluable legacy. Here, also, may be found a number of traditional melodies, which, for half a century or more, have been sung throughout the South and Southwest, and never before in print. We can heartily recommend it to all churches, choirs, and all lovers of Sacred Music."

It has been largely introduced, and highly recommended by many of the Churches in Richmond and Petersburg, where the author is best known. It embraces all the metres in use, in every key and variety of measure, with a full, elementary department and fine collection of new anthems, set pieces, and sentences. It contains nearly 300 closely printed pages, neatly and tastefully gotten up, well printed and bound. Price—retail, $1.35; $12.00 per dozen. Can be obtained through all bookellers, or will be mailed by the Publishers to any of the United States, post free, on receipt of retail price.

TELL US ABOUT CHINA.

Wonder how many thousands of bright eyes have sparkled and faces smiled, as the teachers of schools and Sunday schools all over these United States have announced that one could "tell us something about China." Wonder how many Governors, Mayors, Presidents of railroads and others, have laid aside the cares of office to listen like the little children to stories of travel in the interior of that great country! Wonder how many papers have made room for such things, and if the "Advocate" can!

Little ones, don't ask my name, because I always had an idea that there would be as many missionaries as there is money given to send them, and that if I went without taking any of your money, that there would be one more workman in the field; so I never asked for an appointment; but maybe I was mistaken.

Besides, it always seemed to me if I went where nobody else would go, and where men never would know of Christianity unless I took the Bible to those, that there would be as many more souls added to our Lord's Kingdom as might be saved by my instrumentality.

But may be I did wrong in spending years of my life away off there, for now nobody knows me in my own country, and I don't care to stay here, and I will just tell you a few stories before I go.

Once, near where the Yellow River makes the great bend, about seven hundred miles South-West of Peking, the chief ruler of a city arrested me and put two policemen in the cart, and sent me a thousand English miles, and very often put me in prison on the way; but everywhere the people came and bought Testaments, so that the Chinese Government had all the expense to pay for carrying the Bible a thousand miles.

One day they wanted me to get in the cart and go away before I had sold any books, and the officer pushed the Testaments rudely in my face, and I knocked his hat off with my open hand, because I knew he had no right to do so. Well I did wrong; so he put a chain around my neck and chained me to the cart half a day, and they beat me too. Then the chain got very heavy, for it was large; so I told them, "I don't want this chain on my neck—take it off." So they took it off.

Once, at the city of Kwei-in-fu, the Governor sent a man a hundred miles up the river, to have the water turned in the canal to send forward the boat bearing the Bible. So God touched the hearts of heathen rulers to turn the waters in their courses to send forward the Book of Life.

Once I was gone five months, once ten, and altogether traveled seven thousand miles, and to a hundred and twenty five great cities, through fifteen provinces, and distributed ten thousand Bibles and five thousand New Testaments, and I believe the seed will grow up.

INDEPENDENT MISSIONARY.

A LONG JOURNEY AFTER A BIBLE.

Two men came one night to Mr. Ellis, the missionary of Madagascar. They had walked a hundred miles out of their way to visit him.

"Have you the Bible?" asked Mr. Ellis.

"We have seen it and heard it read," one man said; "but we have only some of the words of David, and they do not belong to us; they belong to the whole family."

"Have you the words of David with you now?" asked Mr. Ellis. They looked at each other and would not answer. Perhaps they were afraid; but Mr. Ellis spoke kindly to them. Then one of the men put his hand in his bosom and took out what seemed to be a roll of cloth.

He unrolled, and after taking off some wrappers, behold, there were a few old, torn, dingy leaves of the Psalms, which had been read, passed around, lent, and re-read, until they were almost worn out. Tears came to Mr. Ellis's eyes when he saw them.

"Have you ever seen the words of Jesus, or John, or Paul, or Peter?" asked the missionary.

"Yes," they said, "we have seen and heard them, but we never owned them."

Mr. Ellis then went and brought out a Testament, with the book of Psalms bound up with it, and showed it to them.

"Now," said he, "if you will give me your few words of David, I will give you all his words, and all the words of Jesus, and John, and Paul, and Peter besides."

They were amazed and delighted; but they wanted to see if the words of David were the same in Mr. Ellis's book; and when they found they were, and thousands more of the same sort, their joy knew no bounds. They willingly gave up their poor, tattered leaves, seized the volume, bade the missionary good bye, and started off upon their long journey home, rejoicing like one who has found a great spoil. Did not these poor men prize the Bible? And had not they found a treasure?

MOZART'S FIRST ROYAL KISS.

Mozart was scarcely three years old when he first placed his little hands upon the keys of the piano fort, and endeavored to execute a succession of thirds, the only extension which could then be accomplished by his short and plump tiny fingers.

Whenever he succeeded in discovering some harmony his eyes became animated with delight. At the age of four, he knew by heart the most prominent part of the concertos performed by his sister, and his father composed for him little pieces which are still in existence.

It was thus that Mozart learned music as a childish pastime, or rather the divine inspiration of music revealed itself in his soul with the first perceptions of his infancy. In 1762 Leopold Mozart, accompanied by his two children, began an artist's pilgrimage through Europe.

The travels of a whole family of musicians going to seek their fortunes in distant countries, were then, and are still, to this day characteristic of the simple manners of the German nation.

Mozart was then hardly six years old. His execution on the piano was already marvelous, and his precocious genius beaming through all he did, seemed to await with impatience the moment when nature would permit him to take possession of the vast empire of musical art.

Leopold Mozart and his two children went first to Munich, in the month of January, 1762. They returned in delight to Salzburg, after having charmed, during three whole weeks, the court of the Elector of Bavaria, one of the most musical of Germany.

In the autumn of the same year they went to Vienna. This voyage was a real triumph for Wolfgang. He remained four days with the Bishop of Liezitz, who could hardly bear to part with so extraordinary a child.

The young Mozart played the organ in a Convent of Franciscans, whose enthusiasm was wound up to the highest degree, and at the gates of Vienna he softened the rigor of the custom-house officers by playing a minuet on a little violin which had been presented to him.

Scarcely had they reached the capital of Austria, when every one flocked to hear the infant virtuoso. Invitations poured in on all sides, and the most splendid equipages succeeded one another at the poor traveler's door.

The noblest ladies, princes, and noblemen, disputed with each other the honor of having at their table Leopold Mozart's two clever children. All three being admitted at court, the Emperor Francis the First came as far as the antechamber to receive them, and conducted them with kindness into the interior apartments occupied by Maria Theresa, surrounded by her fine and numerous family.

Wolfgang, whom nothing intimidated, was soon seated with infantine grace on the Emperor's knee, who ceased not to admire his engaging manners, as well as his extraordinary talent.

In running across the room his foot slipped on the highly polished parquet of the palace, and he fell. The Arch-Duchess, Marie Antoinette, hastened to help him up.

"You are so kind," said Wolfgang to her, "that I should like to marry you."

The hights and recesses of mount Taurus are said to be much infested by eagles, who are never better pleased than when they can pick the bones of a crane. Cranes are prone to cackle and make a noise, (Isa. xxxviii. 14) and particularly so while they are flying. The sound of their voices arouses the eagles, who spring at the signal, and often make the talkative travelers pay dearly for their imprudent chattering. The older and more experienced cranes, sensible of their besetting foible, and the peril to which it exposes them, take care before venturing on the wing, to arm themselves each with a stone, large enough to fill the cavity of their mouths, and consequently to impose unavoidable silence on their tongues, and thus they escape the danger. Reader, hast thou an unruly tongue? Learn a lesson from the elder cranes, and to bridle thy tongue by watchfulness and prayer, that thou mayest say with the Psalmist, who had doubtless witnessed, and perhaps felt, the infirmity of which we have been speaking, "I said, I will take heed to my way, [that] I sin not with my tongue."

PRONOUNCE WHEN YOU SING.

Our readers will find an amusing letter in our columns this month, the subject matter of which we earnestly commend to them; namely, that of eloquence in vocal music. Our choirs, both quartette and chorus, are sadly deficient in this important feature, and it is a matter much to be deplored that so little attention is paid to the pronunciation of the words. Our quartette and solo singers are so in the habit of sacrificing the sentiment to vocal efforts and effect that it would seem they choose to impress their audience with the idea that they not only sing in a foreign tongue, but are really unable to speak their own.

Our chorus choirs behave no better, and from the additional number of voices the effect is, if possible, much worse. The words are made mere vehicles for conveying musical sounds, thus inverting the true order, to the utter perversion of all proper notions of the worship of God. We shall from time to time allude to this as well as other defects or abuses that come under our notice, and we shall (and we doubt not our readers will be glad to hear frequently from our friend Timon.)—Musical Pioneer.

A Visit to Pompeii and Heroulanum.

A recent letter from Italy says: "The next morning after my arrival at Naples I went to Pompeii by an early train—the distance is only fifteen miles—and spent the better part of the day in wandering through the streets, and lanes, and houses of this once buried city; now raised from the dead. Not more than one-third of the city has been disinterred, and even during the short time that I was on the ground where the work of excavation is being extended, I had the pleasure of seeing the workmen lay bare the interior of a wall adorned with beautiful fresco that had not seen the light for nearly eighteen hundred years, the colors of which were as brilliant as when they were first hidden from view by the ashes of Vesuvius."

A French artist, with pencil in hand, was sitting near, ready to transfer to canvas the outlines of the fresco thus newly discovered, while a soldier stood guard to prevent laborers, artists and visitors from the temptation of appropriating any little relic which might "turn up." I did not go to Heroulanum, because there is really little to be seen in the shaft which has been sunk in this buried town, and because the most curious of its treasures are in the museum. I refer to the papyrus, found in a villa near Heroulanum, 1790 in number, and which at first were mistaken for charcoal. I was much interested in the process by which these charred manuscripts are unrolled, deciphered, engraved and printed, under the direction of the government. It is remarkable that no such manuscripts have been found in Pompeii, though the walls of the town with its (and without) abound with just such scribbles as may be found in modern cities."

MASON AND HAMLIN.

MANUFACTURERS OF Cabinet Organs, ALSO PORTABLE ORGANS, Adapted to secular and sacred music for drawing-rooms, churches, Sunday and day-schools, lodges, &c.

Uniting to a considerable extent the capacity of the Piano-Forte with that of the Pipe-Organ, and costing much less than either.

Forty styles, plain or elegant cases; ONE TO TWELVE STOPS; PRICES, $75, $90, $110, $125, $130, $140, $150, $160, $170, $200, $225, $250, $300, $335, $500, $550, $600, AND UPWARDS.

The MASON & HAMLIN CABINET ORGANS were introduced four years since, and a great improvement upon the Melodeon, Harmonium, and other reed organs, greatly exceeding them especially in the excellent quality and variety of their tones; in power and quickness of action, and capacity for expression.

Their success has been entirely beyond precedent, and proves how greatly such an instrument was needed. Again and again the manufacturers have been compelled to double their manufacturing facilities, until they have been increased sixfold. From the most eminent pianists, organists, composers, and vocalists, the MASON & HAMLIN CABINET ORGANS have received an amount and degree of commendation never before bestowed upon any musical instrument. More than two hundred and fifty of the most eminent musicians in the country have given their testimony to the value of the improvements contained in them, and that they excel all other instruments of this class.

FIFTY-TWO GOLD OR SILVER MEDALS, awarded at the highest Fairs, have been awarded to MASON & HAMLIN for the important improvements effected by them and for the SUPERIORITY OF THEIR INSTRUMENTS TO ALL OTHERS.

Constantly exhibiting their instruments in competition with others, they have been awarded the highest premium in every instance, but three or four.

For churches, Sunday schools, &c., they are not less desirable, and are finding a place in the musical families of the principal cities.

They are adapted to a wider range of music than the piano, being better fitted for all sacred music, and for much secular music, while the quickness of action and the most lively, rapid music, can be played on them. Their cost is greatly less, as well their liability to get out of order.

BRIEF EXTRACTS FROM OPINIONS OF DISTINGUISHED MUSICIANS: "I should think that MASON & HAMLIN are the instruments par excellence for all public performance."—SIGESMUND T. HALBERG, the world-renowned Pianist. "To find its way into every household of taste and refinement which can possibly afford its moderate expense."

For superior to everything of its class and of a good classical and practical education, or a complete preparation for any stage of a College or University course.

Every student who enters the school is expected to remain to the close of the session in July, and will be held liable for the bills in all cases, unless protracted illness shall compel his removal.

Circulars are required to furnish their own bed clothing, towels, wash-basin, mosquito-net, etc. Circulars can be obtained by addressing me at Baton Rouge, or Rev. J. C. Keener, D.D., New Orleans, La.

As the number of students is limited, it is earnestly requested that application be made as soon as possible.

CENTENARY COLLEGE.

It was established by the State of Louisiana in 1825, and transferred to the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1845. It is now under the joint patronage of the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences.

The College exercises were necessarily suspended during the war; but were regularly resumed, after reorganization, on the first Monday in October, 1865. The approaching session will open on the first Monday of October next.

Tuition, $75 per annum, payable semi-annually in advance. Boarding can be obtained at from $20 to $25 per month. The Buildings, Libraries, Apparatus, Laboratory and Society Halls, the location in point of air, health, ease of access and good society, are all unsurpassed by those of any institution in the Southern States.

The Board and Faculty promise the public that nothing shall be wanting on their part to secure the thorough education of the young men committed to their care, in both Preparatory and Collegiate Departments.

The old students, alumni, and friends of the Institution, are requested to give publicity to the full reorganization and opening of the College, as stated above.

W. H. WATKINS, President.

SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY. GREENSBORO, ALA. The exercises of this Institution will be resumed on the first Monday in October next. Instruction will be given in the School of Ancient and Modern Languages, Mathematics, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Chemistry, Natural Philosophy, and Biblical Literature. Civil Engineering and Analytical Chemistry will also be taught.

TRIMES: Tuition fees per term, $10 00. Contingent fee, 5 00. Board can be obtained at $20 to $25 per month. W M WIGHTMAN, Chancellor COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE AT BATON ROUGE. The next session of this school will begin on Wednesday, 3d October, 1866.

The object of the school has ever been to afford a good classical and practical education, or a complete preparation for any stage of a College or University course.

Every student who enters the school is expected to remain to the close of the session in July, and will be held liable for the bills in all cases, unless protracted illness shall compel his removal.

Circulars are required to furnish their own bed clothing, towels, wash-basin, mosquito-net, etc. Circulars can be obtained by addressing me at Baton Rouge, or Rev. J. C. Keener, D.D., New Orleans, La.

As the number of students is limited, it is earnestly requested that application be made as soon as possible.

Baton Rouge, La., August 24, 1866.

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE. And Telegraph Institute, 60 Camp Street, corner Natchez, open day and evening. This is a full course Commercial or Business College, in all its departments perfect. Banks and stores are connected, goods actually bought and sold, the books regularly kept, and all the attendant duties of the clerk, book-keeper, correspondent and merchant are practically performed by the student. For catalogues containing full information, call at the office, or address GEO. SOULE.

J. W. BLACKMAN, NEW ORLEANS. CIAL COLLEGE, New Orleans, corner of Canal and Carondelet streets, entrance on Carondelet. This Institution is mainly devoted to qualifying young men for Clerk or Book-keeping, the mercantile and other pursuits. It is open the entire year, both day and evening. Penmanship, Book-keeping, Mathematics, English, French, Spanish and German are practically taught by experienced professors. Persons from 12 to 60 years of age attend. The instruction is adapted to each student. A separate apartment for ladies. Young persons who have neglected their education, can here speedily perfect themselves in any branch they may wish. The Principal has been a practical teacher in New Orleans since 1851. For further particulars call at the College office, room No. 14, or address 13-ly J. W. BLACKMAN, Principal.

SOUTH-WESTERN BIBLE SOCIETY.

Where is it located? Its Depository and Street, New Orleans.

When was it established? 1850.

Who is its General Agent to whom contributions should be sent? Its business should be addressed to W. H. Baylis.

What is the Society's field of labor? All Louisiana, and all of Mississippi, south of the 33rd parallel of North latitude.

What is the object of the Society? To compile and supply (whenever needed) the distribution of the Holy Scriptures.

What are the resources and whence the income of the Society? From the annual contributions of its members. Collections of Churches within its field, collections at public meetings, and from the sale of Bibles.

What are the terms of membership? The payment of $30 at one time constitutes a life member.

The taking up of a collection by a church constitutes the Pastor an honorary member.

Having thus briefly stated the main features of the Society's work, income and expenditure, I earnestly ask the aid of all lovers of the Bible, whether professors of religion or not, in strengthening the hands of the S. W. B. S. by founding or reviving Auxiliaries, by donating and urging donations, by exploring and compiling the destitution of the Scriptures, by repairing or relieving members of all grades, and by establishing connections with the Society as the Lord has prospered them according to Scripture which says "Lay not your treasures upon earth where thieves break in and steal; but lay up for yourselves treasures where neither moth nor rust can corrupt, and where neither thieves nor thieves can break in and steal." To ministers and churches of every Orthodox Protestant denomination, we respectfully appeal with confidence for the Society's aid in the noble work of the Lord.

Our last thought is the hearty of the Great Reformation. No fulfilling of the Word is complete without the text: no man's note is complete without the Word: Christ's Word: the Holy Spirit's Word: Free: Free: Free. 225 ly.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, VA. IN FULL OPERATION.

THIS TIME HONORABLE INSTITUTION is now in successful operation, with a FULL CORPS OF PROFESSORS. The chairs of the several sciences are filled by able and experienced men. There are five literary and scientific schools, viz: OF ANCIENT LANGUAGES, CHEMISTRY AND NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, MODERN LANGUAGES, AND MODERN LANGUAGES. In addition to these, the Board of Trustees have established a school of MEDICAL SCIENCE, with the view of giving to the young men of the country a BUSINESS EDUCATION.

To graduates in all these schools, Diplomas are granted and the degrees of Bachelor of Arts and of Doctor of Medicine are conferred upon students who accomplish a course of study of the grade of scholarship formerly required. The high maintenance. We have full CHEMICAL and PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS for the illustration of the subjects taught.

The location of the College is unsurpassed for health and geniality. It is situated midway between the mountains and the seaboard; and with thousands of young men in attendance, there has never been a death arising from malarial or other local cause. We profess to educate young men not mentally but physically also.

BOARD OF SIXTEEN DOLLARS PER MONTH. Tuition from $40 to $50, according to the number of schools attended. $250 will cover expenses of board, tickets for three months matriculation and contingent fees for ten months.

Rooms in the college free of charge, but the student must furnish his own furniture, fuel and lights. Young men who are preparing for the ministry and those disabled by the late war, are unable to pay their tuition, will be allowed to attend any or all of the schools free of charge.

This College is situated near Boydton, the county seat of Mecklenburg county, Va. Arrangements are made to transport students from Raleigh Depot, on the Raleigh and Weldon Railroad, whilst a conveyance leaves Roanoke station, on the Richmond and Danville Railroad, on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, and the Wolf Trap Depot, on the same road, Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

We solicit a liberal patronage from Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina, from the West, South and New York.

Students will be received at any time. The second term will commence on the 1st day of February next. Young men will be received and prepared for the College proper. For further particulars address the undersigned at Boydton, Mecklenburg county, Va. Tnos C Johnson, President R M College: Dec22 31

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

Since our last publication the general market has exhibited a fair degree of activity, although few of the leading articles have undergone a quotable alteration. There has been an active demand for Sugar and Molasses, at higher prices, and the demand in Western Produce has exhibited considerable vitality, attended, however, with an easier feeling in Flour; while operations in our leading staple have evinced more animation, and notwithstanding the market suffered a slight loss on Saturday, yet, under the influence of a brisk enquiry on Monday, it became more buoyant, and closed firm yesterday at our quotations.

COTTON—On Saturday, notwithstanding factors were disposed to yield, the majority of buyers manifested little inclination to operate, preferring to await later intelligence. Hence the sales were light, footing up at the close 3000 bales, at prices 1c lower. On Monday the demand was more active, and although factors failed to recover the previous loss, still a thorough feeling pervaded the movement throughout, the sales comprising 5400 bales, at hardening prices. Yesterday the market opened with a liberal enquiry, and notwithstanding the increased stringency of holders, quite a fair business was transacted, the day's sales summing up 5700 bales, the market closing firm, at our quotations.

The receipts proper for the past four days comprise 15,505 bales, against 12,781 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 2724.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 335,300 bales, against 376,118 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest date, as compared with last year, is 129,794 bales. In the exports from the United States to our foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 151,441 bales to Great Britain, of 995 to France, and an increase of 9216 bales to other foreign ports.

TOBACCO—Is in good demand, and there have been sales of 616 hhds, at full prices, including 108 hhds Lugs to Medium Clankville, and Western District, yesterday, at—1 Low Leaf, Western District, at 5 1/2c, 1 Good Light Low Leaf, at 12c, 1 Fine new Leaf at 16c, 3 new Good Leaf at 8c, 1 at 7c, 1 old bales at 20c 1 fair, old, Outlings at 8c and 1 at 8c per lb. The receipts of the new crop are light and have sold readily, while the stock on hand of the old crop is small and the desirable descriptions are selling rapidly. The market is very firm, and we continue to quote as follows:

FLOUR—The market has been dull and only a retail business was done on Saturday and Monday at $9 75 for Common, $10 to $10 50 for Fine, $11 37 1/2 to $11 40 for Superfine, $11 50 to $11 75 for Single Extra, $12 37 1/2 to $12 75 for Double Extra, $13 to $13 75 for Treble Extra, and $14 25 to $15 per bbl for Choice Extra. Yesterday there was a better demand, prices were firmer and 1500 bbls were sold, in small lots, to dealers, at $10 for Fine, $11 25 to $11 40 for Superfine, $12 50 for some Extra on its merits, and $14 50 to $15 for Choice Extra.

Monetary.

The movement in Coin has been light, although rates, sympathizing with the New York market, have evinced a material improvement. Gold opened on Saturday at 133 1/2 to 134, and without exhibiting any marked irregularity, closed firm at 133 1/2 to 134; it opened on Monday at 134, and continued comparatively steady throughout the day, closing still at 134 to 134 1/2, and open d yesterday at 134 1/2, and after the transaction of a limited business, closed at 134 1/2 to 134 1/2.

OFFICE—113 CAMP STREET.

THE SURE WITNESS.

BY ALICE GARY.

The solemn wood had spread Shadows around my head—
"Contains they are," I said,
"Hang dim and still about the house of prayer;
Solely among the limbs,
Turning the leaves of hymns,
I heard the winds; and asked if God were there,
No voice replied, but while I listening stood,
Sweet peace made holy hushes through the wood.

With rudely open hand,
I saw the wild-rose stand
Beside the green gate of the summer hills;
And pulling at her dress,
I cried, "Sweet Hermitess, Hast thou beheld Him who the dew distills?"
No voice replied; but while I listening bent,
Her gracious beauty made my heart content.

The moon in splendor shone;
"She walketh heaven alone,
And seeth all things," to myself I mused;
"Hast thou beheld Him, then,
Who hides himself from men,
In that great power through Nature interposed."
No speech made answer, and no sign appeared;
But in the silence I was soothed and cheered.

Waking one time, strange awe Thrilling my soul, I saw
A kindly splendor round about the night;
Such cunning work and grand;
No spinner ever planned;
The finest wool may not be washed as white.
"Hast thou been in His hand?" I asked, and lo!
The snow was all the answer of the snow.

Then my heart said, "Give o'er;
Question no more, no more!"
The wind, the snow-storm, the wild hermit flower,
The illuminated air,
The pleasure after prayer,
Proclaim the unoriginated Power!
The mystery that hides him here and there
Bears the sure witness, He is everywhere.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.
THE FUNDAMENTAL TRUTHS OF CHRISTIANITY.

REVELATION.

From the German, by Prof. J. B. A. ADDRESS.
All systems of religion have claimed some divine Revelation in their support. This is a solid proof for the necessity of the Christian Revelation.

1. We notice this necessity.

A divine Revelation is man a two-fold necessity: to his reasoning spirit, and to his moral nature.
Never, uninspired, did mortal rise with his thoughts to the eternal and true God. And even though the ancient philosophers by their polytheism recognized a divine Omnipotence in nature, the God of mercy and the God of love was never known.

Whence then is sin? Our conscience accuses us of sin, and our experience testifies thereto. What woful elegies has not this sin drawn forth from the breasts of our great poets! and the philosophers—how were they ever lost in mazes, wild when arguing on the origin of sin!
Man knows with Schiller that "Life's net of earthly looms the highest,

But the evil's quintessence is sin."

Never was without the Bible this mighty problem solved. Vain it was for Socrates to teach that sin—this radical evil, as Kant has called it—was but the result of barbarism, and, could therefore, be abolished by an improvement of society. Is it not an indubitable fact that among the most refined, the sins are that much more refined, and therefore that much more damnable? Even Fichte has confessed:

"Uselessly,
Now for many years we've filled a giant's sieve with water—
Like strangest birds we've tried to hatch out rocks—
But, lo! the years rolled round, and still the sieve is empty,
And still the rocks are rocks."

2. But was a divine Revelation possible? There is but one way to deny it, and that is to deny the existence of a personal God. Or, what think you, should God, who is the source of all life, be immovable?
Should He, who is the fountain head of all love, be dumb? Vain it is to argue that our Revelation proved an absurdity to man's rational conception of the Deity; nay, rather is the advocacy of the opposite, an absurdity.

3. There remains one more objection to the fact of a divine Revelation. It is held that such Revelation would be a miracle, and that all miracles were impossible. Is not man under two laws—necessity and freedom? He is under the law of necessity, because he is a child of nature, but he is also under the law of freedom, because he is a personal and moral being. Or, is man only a subject of physics and not of ethics? And if now man is a free agent, because he is a personal moral being, does not then the same hold true with regard to God? Was not the creation of the world and of man of all miracles the greatest?

"But," says one, "miracles upset the unmovably eternal laws of nature." But may not God, who first established these laws, in accordance with His designs, temporarily interrupt those laws? When our arm hurls a stone into the air, then is that not the effect of gravitation, but the effect of a law superior to that of gravitation—the effect of our will and our might. Howbeit, thereby is the law of gravitation not upset. Thus miracles are the result of a superior causality operating through the ordinary causalities without effecting their constituent laws.

4. Agreed, then, that the Christian Revelation was necessary, and is possible, are, then, those Scriptures purporting to be divinely inspired, actually the word of God? We have the testimony of the apostles.
In their writings, we breathe the spirit of truth. They were men of sound sense, and sound nerves. More:
there is no historical fact better authenticated than the resurrection of Jesus Christ. After rising from the tomb, the Lord was not seen by a few, but by hundreds, and to whose testimony Paul applied when yet alive. There could be no hallucination.

Also, the vast host of martyrs comes in, to prove the divinity of our Revelation. Another proof comes from the enemies of the Master, the Jews scattered over all the earth. To all this comes the witness of the Holy Ghost. Whenever the word of God confronts our conscience, a still small voice tells us: "This is the truth!" And this voice can be understood by all men—
the erudite and unlettered.

5. "But," says one, "how can the Christian Revelation be eternal truth, when she avowedly contradicts our reason?" Indeed does this Revelation, and must needs, go beyond the limits of human reason.
Even Lessing confesses: "If at all a divine Revelation is possible and necessary, then must it be to our reason more a proof for the divinity of the same, than the contrary, when she contains things which transcend our conception. For what would a Revelation be which revealed nothing? An imprisonment of man's reason under the law of faith is unavoidably necessary, in order to conceive of a Revelation.

Human reason must confess her boundaries. Even in natural things, this is already necessary. All sciences rest on principles which are universally believed to be true, without being proved to be so. Nor could a proof always be furnished.
The more profound a man of research is, the more humble and modest he becomes, for he discovers his boundaries. But the contrary holds true with regard to men of superficial acquisitions. Very beautifully says Pascal: "The last step of human reason is, that an infinite number of things lie beyond her grasp; and so long as this has not been discovered, she is still in her infancy."

And very specially is this true, with regard to things divine. "The reason of man, and the reason of God, are two very different things," says Goethe. And Leibnitz: "Who in divine things, believes not more than he can measure with his reason, knows little of the limits of his reason."

There is nothing more paradoxical to our reason than the Christian Revelation. How, then, is this Revelation true? No! it is our moral nature, and through it our reason, which are morbidly affected;
thus showing that the obvious contradiction of the Christian Revelation, to human reason, is an incon-vertible proof for the divinity of the former. Only when we heed the truths divinely revealed, our reason assumes her proper attitude.

Very appropriately says Pascal:
"Human things must be understood, in order to love them, but divine things we must love, in order to understand them."

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.
READING—NO. IV.

In these articles on reading we have reserved the best of the wine for the last of the feast. We now urge upon you, before all books, esteem and read the Bible, for it is unlike and superior to all others.
Considered in any aspect, the Bible demands attention, and asserts pre-eminence. For its authorship the Bible claims the inspiration of God.
The same Eternal Spirit that conceived and created the universe, with its immeasurable vastness, grandeur and beauty, conceived and gave utterance, through "holy men," prophets and apostles, to all the sublime and glorious announcements of the Holy Book. The same Eternal and Almighty Being, who kindled the fires of the sun, and lighted up all the splendors of the stellar host, has poured the radiance of his supernatural intelligence upon the pages of the Bible, and made them "bright with the glory of increased light.
As light flames from every point of the starry heavens, so light divine flashes from all the pages of the Book of God. The light shines back beyond all recorded speech, illuminates the birth of time and earth, and points to those far-off pre-historic ages of the past eternity. It shines upon the footsteps of eternal providence as it walks down the ages, points beyond earth's consummated history, and times' concluded mission—points to fairer worlds on high. If it be a privilege to soar with Milton, to season with Bacon, and to calculate with Newton, as with rapt delight and awe he contemplates the heavens, proclaiming the glory of God. What an honor, what an exaltation of soul, to converse with God, through the medium of his own inspired word; yet such is the high privilege of all who "search the Scriptures."

Viewed as a history, the Bible is the most ancient and authentic in the world. Older than Homer, the father of poetry, older than Herodotus, the father of history, and treats of matters far more ancient than the Pyramids and hieroglyphics of Egypt. Much of it was written while Assyria, the first of Empires, ruled the world. And all of it was written while yet Imperial Rome was regnant and mistress of the world. Is it inquired of what matters is the Bible historical?
The origin of man, the introduction of evil, the march of providence, and the birth of nations. It contains, as epical from its great subjects, a mass of biography, the most authentic, curious, wonderful and instructive in the world. It contains the biography of the first progenitor of our race—of the holiest men that ever lived—of statesmen, warriors, prophets and kings, men renowned in miracles, and inspired song—of God manifested in the flesh.

The Bible excels all books in the variety of its matter. It is a book of history, of moral philosophy, of biography, of manners and customs, of wars and battles, voyages and travels; in short, a book of public wonders, of exquisite beauties, and practical utilities.

The Bible exhausts the varieties of style, narrative, colloquial, epistolary. Sometimes it argues with logic and resistless logic, sometimes it soars into the highest heaven of thought, sometimes utters profound truths deeper than an archangel's line can fathom. Sometimes it is most pathetic and all bedewed with tears of tenderness and love. In all these varieties of style, it is a master, and without a parallel in recorded speech.

As a literary book, the Bible is allowed to be the most curious and original in the world. Large as it is, there is no one page of quotations in it, save from itself. It is said, by competent judges, to contain more knowledge of life, and the human heart, than all the writings of Thucydides, Horace, Clarendon, and Shakespeare put together. "It comprises," (says one,) all that was discovered, and much that was overlooked by the moral philosophers of ancient and modern times; the proof of this statement is this, Bishop Butler may be said to have been the corrector of the ancient ethical writers—McKintosh, Robert Hall, and Dr. Chalmers—no inconsiderable writers of modern times, acknowledge that they were taught by Butler, and he only pretends to have been taught by the Bible." These may be regarded as the literary attractions that should incline and win us to the reading of the Bible.

The moral considerations, however, that stand connected with the reading of the Bible, invest its reading with an importance that immeasurably transcends that involved in any other reading.

All that is important for us to know and do, as moral and accountable creatures, is clearly taught us in the Bible, and enforced by the most solemn and glorious sanctions.
The Bible reveals the immortality of man, and instructs him how to attain to its blessed fruition.

The reading of the Bible brings eternity to the near contemplation of the soul, and makes it feel the unspeakable importance of being prepared for its tremendous awards.
Let us then beseech you, by the vast interest of your deathless natures, to give attention to the reading of the Scriptures, which are able to make you wise unto salvation.

The Bible has formed more pure and exalted characters than all other books. The Iliad fired the ambition of Alexander, and Plu-tarch's lives kindled the aspirations of Napoleon; but the Bible made Howard and Washington. The last three centuries have produced throughout Christendom, a host of illustrious characters, who have adorned every station, and shed lustre upon human nature. Upon what basis were their characters built? Upon the Bible. By what hand were their noble moral proportions shaped and reared on high?
By the Bible. What fired their generous ambition, and called forth their self-sacrificing devotion to the noblest and holiest interest of their race? The Bible.

The Bible is, by pre-eminence, the book for the young, it should be their "guide, philosopher and friend."
The Bible, by its precepts and living examples, will best fit them for all the social relations and business activities of time; and it alone, of all books, essays to reveal the path, and lead the way to everlasting life.

We are brought to Jesus by realizing the horrors of the eternal death as well as by His matchless love. We turn our weary footsteps to the Benah-Land of our God in "fleeing from the wrath to come."
When the adversary succeeds in implanting the doubt of this truth in our hearts, there surges upon our lives the waves of that shore-less ocean of uncertainty and doubt, embarking upon which, we may never, never return to the sure, firm land of our childhood's faith.

Implant the belief that there is no hell, in the mind of any person, and without a shadow of a doubt, that person will grow bolder in the commission of sin; utterly careless in religious belief, and question every doctrine of the word of God; finally denying the work of Christ himself.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The London Missionary Society was established in 1797, and has received from the public in general contributions, legacies, dividends, foreign contributions, and special funds, up to the present time, the sum of £3,262,346, and has expended from 1796, in India, £1,025,188; China,
£278,690; Madagascar, £79,590; South Seas, £364,485; South Africa, £359,631; West Indies, £433,145;
Siberia, £29,390; Greek Islands, £15,961; Continent and North America, £22,226; students, &c., £90,198; missionary families, £292,859; publications, $61,829; home agency, £229,112; total, £3,190,652, leaving a balance in favor of receipts of £71,964, which is invested in stock, and has a nominal value of £84,160.
The publications and home agency make up the administration of the Society, and the means of raising and expending its funds have amounted £293,039.

An Instructive Comparison.

The population of the United States may be stated, in round numbers, at thirty millions. The number of books of all kinds published in this country, during the twelve years preceding 1842, was 1,505.
Of these, 752 were reprints. The number of books published in 1855 was 1,095. This included reprints, translations, essays, etc., etc. From 1856 to 1858 the total number of publications was 5,302. During the first six months of 1866, 751 volumes of all kinds were published.—
These estimates are rather above than below the mark. The number of books exported from this country is too insignificant to be mentioned. Our imports of books are absolutely less than those of Belgium, of Switzerland and of Spain.

The population of France is between thirty-five and thirty-six millions. The National Quarterly Review, which has gathered some curious facts on both publications, remarks that in 1852 there were published in France 8,285 literary works alone. The number of musical compositions published in France in that year, was greater than that of all the books issued or re-issued in this country. The total number of publications in France from 1851 to 1855 was nearly 500,000.

The population of Austria is between thirty-six and thirty-seven millions. The number of publications in 1854 was 24,039. More books were published in the single province of Hungary than in the United States.

The population of the United Kingdom is thirty-two millions.
The number of books published from 1816 to 1851 was 43,073.— During twelve recent years, in which our average annual publication was a fraction over one hundred books, the average for England was 1,252.

The population of Holland is little, if any, over three millions, one-tenth of our own.

Yet that little Kingdom published in 1856, 1,859 books, many more than were issued by all the presses in the United States. The number of newspapers published in this country, however, probably exceeds that of all Europe; and the best part of the American mind finds expression in our periodical literature.

Some one advised Alexander Logan, a witty Scotch advocate, to read a bombastic book on a good subject, saying "Don't you like to expatiate in that field?" when he replied, "I can't get over the style."

BRITISH HONDURAS.

But what are more curious than these foreign liquors, and less dangerous in their use, here are shown specimens of the products of a country very far to the South of our own sunny land—from British Honduras, deposited at the Exchange by Mr.
J. M. Palmer, of Balize, viz: cocoa, or chocolate nut, which grows in the forests there (as well as on the West India Islands and in South America,) the market value of which is placed at 12½ to 25 cents per pound. The cacao is a tree something like a cherry, from which hang pods like cucumbers, in each of which are twenty to thirty cacao nuts, something of the size and shape of almonds. Two crops a year are produced on these trees.
From this nut, as most know, chocolate is manufactured. Instead of importing cacao and making our own chocolate in New Orleans, we perceive by the brands on sale by our merchants, that we permit France and England to do this importing and manufacturing for us.
At various windows you see those brands. Hundreds of years ago, according to travelers in Noth Moxico and Honduras, the natives made excellent chocolate—certainly better than that we obtain from England, the cakes of which are composed of about one half cacao and the remainder of flour or castile soap.
In France they do better, mixing with their cacao the more palatable articles of sugar, vanilla, cinnamon, cloves, almonds, etc. Would it not be as well to manufacture it in New Orleans, so as to be sure of the ingredients forming the paste?
Also, specimens of bread, made by the Carib women from the root of a shrub called cassava, or casada also South American. This shrub has beautiful flowers, but it is the root only that is useful; and though when raw it is poisonous, good but rather insipid bread is made, from its flour. Of the pure flour, tapioca is formed, so common in old soups and puddings.

The curious can also there see specimens of sugar cane eight to twelve feet in length, and six to seven inches in circumference, grown in British Honduras without cultivation, from rattoons, which continue productive for twenty years. This cane makes, with the most primitive mode of manufacture, from one and a half to three tons of sugar per acre. Accompanying it is a bloom of the samo cane. Also, tree rice, grown on high and low lands, without irrigation. It yield 3000 to 4000 lbs. per acre, and two crops annually. Here is also coffee, in the natural pods and cleaned.
Also fibre of hennep plant, from which manilla rope is made. It grows in large quantities in Campeche and Yucatan. Also, sarsaparilla, from Santa Thomas and Guatemala. And cotton, a sample from 10 bales from British Hondoras.

Advices recently from Reel Foot
Lake, in Obion county, West Tenn., informs us that the assemblage of water fowls at that place is truly marvelous. Several years ago a large and well timbered region, some seven miles long, suddenly sank during an earthquake, and the basin suddenly filled up with water, forming the present Reel Foot Lake. Almost every species of a aquatic bird, great and small, from the tiniest plover to the stately swan, now frequent the spot. Canvas back ducks now dance on the surface like great fleets of lilliputian vessels, wild geese sound their trumpet calls on all sides, and tall cranes wade lazily about in regiments in search of food. Brants, cormorants, teal, mallards, didappers and snipes darken the air at times with the sweep of their many colored wings.
Not unfrequently a magnificent swan, robed in plumes of spotless purity, the very poetry of the wave, floats by the delighted sportsman, and too often falls the victim of his fowling peace. The traffic in these birds is becoming quite an item, and large numbers of them are shipped to Memphis. There is probably not a more attractive sport for fishermen or huntsmen in the whole country.

JESUS CHRIST, HIS TIMES, LIFE, AND WORK.

BY DE PRESSE.

The author of this work, De Presse, the editor of the Revue Chrétienne, is perhaps the most distinguished leader of French Evangelical Protestantism, and was perhaps the most notable man living to furnish a counteraction to Renan's romance of Jesus. He is scarce Renan's inferior in brilliancy of style, is more than his equal in a true sympathy and perfect mastery of his subject, and, like Renan, has traversed the Holy Land, not according to the vain boast of Renan to furnish a fifth and fancy Gospel, but to acquire a true appreciation of the existing fact. The work is formally controversial in but a subordinate degree; its main purpose being positive, namely, to set forth the true image of Jesus from the data furnished by the evangelical records. It is a timely and masterly performance, written with freshness and power; and inasmuch as, according to Pressense's statement, Renan's book "has given us an impetus to thought, and fired the public mind with an enthusiasm for questions which twenty years ago would assuredly have been pronounced superannuated," we cannot but hope that the present work will be an efficient providential instrument in attaining the triumph of a pure Christianity in France.

The work is divisible into two parts. The first part is a dissertation preliminary to the great biography, and the second is the biography itself. The preliminary consists first of three chapters upon the credibility of the supernatural, affording perhaps no great new thought, but written with great freshness and life. A statement of this part of the subject impressive to the feelings is indeed legitimate and suitable; for the mental state which rejects the supernatural is rather a temper and feeling than a logical position. The proposition that there is no supernatural, or that no miraculous manifestations ever took place, never has been and never can be proved but by the assumption of itself. It is primarily a piece of bold conjectural negative faith; as bold a faith as any dogma of Christian theology requires; and bolder, too, since it stands in contradiction to that primary presentment of our highest nature, which through all the history of our race has affirmed the reality of the supernatural, and has demanded that manifestations of the divine should take place upon earth. To our highest nature miracles, in their proper place and order, are antecedently probable. Our author then traces with a vivid pencil the anterior history of Judaism subsequent to the close of the Old Testament, to its relations to Paganism and to the future Christianity. Nowhere have we seen this subject invested with so vivid an interest. Its purpose in our author's hands is to disprove the merely human development of Christianity from the course of antecedent human thought, and to show its divine originality, both in its doctrines and in the unparalleled character of Christ's own person. With a review, then, of the origin and evidences of the four Gospels, refuting the criticism and logic of Renan, the first part of the work closes.

The narrative of the Lord's life, which forms the second part, is purely the combination of the Gospel accounts, standing in the light of contemporary history, defended against the cavils of skepticism, and illustrated with philosophic thought and beauty of style. Some concessions there are to the spirit of skepticism, unnecessary acknowledgments of minor mistakes on the part of the Gospel writers, wrung from him doubtless in the heat of the battle, but quite unacceptable to the calm firm faith of the American evangelical Church. Upon these we need not be severe, but rather sustain and back this noble champion of the gospel with indulgent allowance for the difficulties of his arduous position. An American edition of the work, with some revisions of the translation, and a few cautionary notes, could not fail, we think, of producing a beneficial effect.

It is a point much pressed by Strauss, and other skeptical writers, that it is incredible that the raising of Lazarus, if actual, should have been left unnoticed by three of the Evangelists. To what is said by Pressense (as well as what we have said in our commentary upon the passage) let us suggest a further thought. Neither of the three Evangelists besides John was probably present; and probably they were either unaware of the fact, or at any rate of its importance in hastening the catastrophe. Mark and Luke were of course absent. And Jesus has just emerged from the Persian history furnished by Luke alone, which, bearing the most striking traits of authenticity, was not the result of the Evangelist's personal eye-sight, but consists apparently of documentary matter. From the whole of that Persian history Matthew, since he omits the whole, may have been absent, and coming from Galilee after the resurrection of Lazarus, may have joined the company of Jesus at the Passover. What wonder, therefore, that John, the sole Evangelist present, should have been the sole narrator of the event?

Both the beautiful style and the reverent spirit of De Presse are exhibited in the following passages, being the closing two paragraphs of his work:

At the close of this long contemplation of the Divine model, on which I have been gazing, in the earnest endeavour to reproduce some of its features, I feel overwhelmed with the sense of my powerlessness. "I would fain, O Divine Son of Mary," to use the words of one of thy noblest confessors, "feeble as I am, have said something great of thee." At times I have seemed, in the brief illumination of some blessed hour, to see thee in thy Divine Majesty—thy brow radiant with love and grief, and crowned with that spotless purity which has terrors only for the proud, because it is inseparable from thy sovereign love. I have seemed to see thee on the shore of the lake thou lovedst, or in the villages of Galilee, in the midst of that retinue of the afflicted and despoiled, who formed thy guard of honor in thy royal progress of mercy. But when I have sought to fix the holy vision, the pencil has trembled in my unskillful hands, and I have only been able to give a dim outline of that which had bowed me in the dust in adoration before thee. What are we, to describe thy holiness?

The distance is too great from us to thee! How can we, from the lowliness of our common lives, rise to the inspiration of that life which was consumed by one single thought of love, and which, from its commencement to its close, was one offering to God and man! Plunged in petty vanities and mean ambition, how can we comprehend thine utter scorn for human glory, O King crowned with thorns! Upon us falls that word spoken in thy just indignation: "Ye are from beneath, I am from above." Therefore it is, that for this very work itself I crave thy forgiveness. My hope, my consolation, is that thou wilt surely disperse the clouds with which, in ignorance or weakness, I may have darkened thine adorable countenance, and manifest thyself plainly to the willing heart in which I may have awakened a desire to know thee better.—Methodist Quarterly Review.

THE ALBERT NYANZA.

The completion by Dr. and Mrs. Baker of the great enterprise, of which Captains Grant and Speke were the pioneers, is the most interesting event which the chroniclers of geographical progress have had to record of late. With the solution of the mystery of ages comes the revelation of many other wonders, equally, although differently mysterious. The anomalies of civilization are many and great; but they are easily understood, readily borne with, in comparison with the anomalies of savage life, of which Dr. Baker's narrative gives a vivid and terrible picture.*

It is a grand story, grandly told, many-sided, and interesting in all its aspects to those who follow its details from Gondokoro, which seems to be the Charing Cross of African travel, to the great basin of the Nile. The imagination follows the brave man and woman who did this great thing with ever-increasing interest; the details of the physical characteristics of the ancient land whose recesses they explored, have a magical charm; the heart beats with an answering exultation to the exultant words which tell how, after months of hardship, terrible even in the recapitulation, the goal was reached at last, the hill was climbed, and the glory of their prize burst upon the weary eyes of the searchers. Fancy revels in the sight they saw, when, like a sea of quicksilver, lay far beneath the grand expanse of water; a boundless sea-horizon on the south and south-west, glittering in the noon-day sun; and on the west, at fifty or sixty miles' distance, blue mountains rising from the bosom of the lake to seven thousand feet above its level. But under the grander aspects, there are considerations which have power to throw all the interests of science, all the edat of discovery and of personal heroism which adorn the narrative, into the shade. They are considerations of the condition of humanity with which the travelers became acquainted.

No foot of European had ever trodden the sand of the shore of that vast inland sea; no white man's eyes had ever scanned the expanse of water; its immensity had never been presented to any mind capable of understanding its meaning. The dwellers by its shores, all unconscious of its mighty beneficence, knew of nought beyond it. They knew nothing of the sacred river whose majestic source was here; of the enormous continent through which its fertilizing volume rolls to the sea; of the men beyond that vast ocean; of all the beautiful, awful world in which this water, meaningless to them, is one of the most awful and beautiful objects. Time had given an answer at last to the question asked of the ages, but the question had no sense for them, the answer no significance. Eyes have they, and see not, those wretched human creatures who people the fairest regions of the African continent; ears, and they hear not. Their faculties of enjoyment are only of the lowest kind, almost too low for our comprehension and acquiescence; but they can and do suffer, so variously, and to such extreme extent of suffering, that all the land seems to lie under an ever-present curse of pain. They are utterly unlike the typical negro of any of the pet forms of European theory, as much opposed to one order of fanaticism as to another. The Exeter Hall "gentleman in black," equal to the Englishman in intellect, and superior to him in virtue and morals; the pious negro, of gushing sentiments, and equally adapted for "bar, bench, or bishop," is not a more outrageously absurd phantom of the philanthropic imagination, when looked at by the stern and steady light shed from these pages, than the opposition type supplied by proslavery theorists. The banjo-playing, brightly-tinted bandana-wearing, grinning, dancing, "pumpkin-sarce"-eating nigger is only an "allegory on the banks of the Nile." Sober and serious thoughts, very painful fancies, and speculations devoid of all guidance, are awakened in the mind, as we follow the track of the explorers through scenes, now of sublime natural beauty, anon of hideous desolation, in which the very deepest abysses of human degradation yawn before the startled gaze, and the limits of the sufferings incidental to human wretchedness are reached. Captain Grant's savage acquaintances were infinitely superior to the human creatures whom Dr. and Mrs. Baker "discovered" on the White Nile; and Dr. Livingstone's friends, even those who wear the pelds, were desirable associates in comparison. This conviction is irresistible; and yet, the truth is told with much modification, and a great deal is absolutely suppressed.

The first instance of certain characteristics, worse and lower than those which we habitually associate with the African savage, is afforded by Dr. Baker's account of the Kitch tribe; the saddest episode among many which are very sad, in the story which he has to tell. In no other account of savage tribes is anything so melancholy and so repulsive to be found as in Dr. Baker's description of these wretched people. The violence, the brutality, even the cannibalism which characterize so many miserable races of human beings, are less haunting to the imagination, less disturbing in their influence on the mind, than the hideous physical degradation, the appalling condition of chronic want found among the Kitch tribe. Their country might be the domain of Giant Despair; it is a succession of vast, treeless marshes, swarming with mosquitoes, and covered with anthills. The people are inconceivably degraded; mere apes, never tasting meat, except when they find the carcass of a dead animal, which they enjoy the more the greater the pitch of decomposition which it has attained. They will not work; and exist upon rats, lizards, snakes, and such fish as they can spear by random casts of their rude harpoons. Men and women are entirely naked, and are mere skeletons, with a wasted, gnat-like appearance, sickening even in the picture which presents it to our imagination. They have no dwellings of any kind; merely herding together like wild beasts among the ant-hills, crouching at night in the smoke of their wood-fires, rubbing themselves with the ashes, to protect their shivering bodies from the cold, and spending hours in digging out from their burrows the field mice, which are dainty items in their list of comestibles. They devour the skins of dead animals, and pounding the bones between stones, boil them to a horrid kind of porridge, thus utilizing every scrap of their chance provision, while they have no notion of providing a regular supply. Happless wretches that they are, they have all the suffering of their animal instincts, but are so degraded that they cannot even "consider the ant," which abounds in their country, from whose industry, wisdom, and art, they derive their sole shelter—the only little trace of comfort in all their woful lives. If it be admissible to use such an expression at all in connection with them, their moral system is lower than any among even the worst specimens of savage tribes; and the Austrian mission, the priests having labored among them utterly in vain for years, has been finally abandoned. No spark of intelligence, however faint, that the hard-ly-tried Faith, Hope, and Charity, which inspire such exertions all over the world, could blow into ever so feeble a flame, was discernible in these wretched beings' nature.

Arrived at the Latooka country, a tribe presented themselves who differ physically from any of the various types of the savages of the White Nile. They are tall, shapely, finely developed, with handsome features, pleasing countenances, and high, straight foreheads. Their trade is in cattle, and they are a fine, war-like race. So far, the picture is pleasing, but only so far; the degradation and brutality of their lives and habits are appalling, and Dr. Baker sums them up by the following extract from his journal: "They have neither gratitude, pity, love, nor self-denial; no idea of duty; no religion, but covetousness, ingratitude, selfishness and cruelty. All are thieves, idle, envious, and ready to plunder and enslave their weaker neighbors. These creatures leave their dead unburied, perform 'funeral' dances of a description more than grotesque, wear no clothes, place all their personal ambition in constructing intricate and ponderous head-dresses, mostly helmet-shaped, of their own hair, and which take eight or ten years in their construction. They are entirely ignorant of the art of cultivation of anything but corn, vegetables being quite unknown in their country. The women are wretched, over-taxed slaves, horrible to look upon, with their fantastically gashed faces, and hair plastered with red ochre and fat; and their dwellings have to be entered on all-fours, and do not boast even the most rudimentary attempt at a window. Yet the Latooka people are very much superior to any of the Nile tribes with whom Dr. Baker was brought into contact, and he details a conversation between himself and Commoro, their king, which ought to make Dr. Colenso's controversial Zulu look to his argumentative laurels.

The African elephant abounds in the Latooka country, but the people, upon whom the noble brute is a terrible satire, only destroy, it has never occurred to them to domesticate him. In strong contrast with the Latooka are the Makkarikas, a cannibal tribe on the west bank of the White Nile, concerning whom, Dr. Baker relates particulars, which throw M. DuChaillet's stories into the region of tame probability, and business-like social organization. The mutual exchange system in the human flesh trade, which he describes as obtaining among the Fannus, does not necessarily, except things are depressed, and corpses at a premium, imply murder; but the noble savage, called a Makkarikas, loves, like the tiger, to kill his own meat, and has, besides, a peculiar predilection for dogs' flesh. How horrible these wretches are, the midst of the anecdotes related of their doings will suffice to prove. From the horror of this picture, it is almost pleasant to get to that of the natives of the Obbo country, whither the travelers proceeded from Latooka, journeying through a beautiful park-like country, bounded by a range of noble hills, and diversified by grand granite peaks, rising abruptly from the soft bosom of the dense vegetation in the valleys. The Obbo people are rather good looking, particularly the women. They are not so wholly devoid of religion as the other tribes, if superstition may be accepted as a proof of the capacity for faith; for though they have not the faintest idea of a Supreme Being, they are even and ardent believers in sorcery. They invest their cunning old chief, Kateliba, with supernatural power, and ceaselessly propitiate him, with a view to future favors. He is excessively cunning, and perhaps deceives himself; at all events, he makes the popular belief pay, and being a really superior man, he is a very good ruler for the wretched creatures who come to him for spells to procure the preservation of their crops, and the increase of their families. Dr. Baker trusted the old humbler with the care of his wife during a short absence on an exploring expedition; and as he was perfectly faithful to the trust, and received an excellent character from the lady, presented him with beads, bracelets, and a pair of sun-goggles, in which, as they formed his entire costume, he must have presented a very droll effect. He was extremely pleased, and exhibited himself to his people with much graciousness and complacency.

TICKETS FOR HEAVEN.—Just now there are, sold in Paris and elsewhere (says the Pall Mall Gazette) small packets of cards purporting to be "tickets for heaven." "Billet d'entrée pour le ciel." They are published by authority, to-wit, by G. Latuille, Editeur Pontificale, Rue Garanciere, Paris, and consist of sixteen embossed cards, on each of which is an engraving depicting the particular mode of reaching heaven, for which that ticket is good.

THE PAPAJOY.

The language of the Pope, says the Journal des Debats, surpasses in violence all that we could anticipate, and, we must add, all that we could fear, for, as regards ourselves, it really is not without a certain fear that we contemplate the dark results that may be produced by those defenses which the Church throws out to the entire world. We say the Church, for she it is that speaks, and as it happened in the case of the promulgation of the Immaculate Conception, the whole body of the Church will follow its head. It is henceforth useless to mark artificial distinctions between the pretended parties in the Catholic community. Rome, allows, of no reasonings, and calls all hesitation rebellion; Rome having spoken, the cause has been judged. And how she has spoken! What a harsh lesson she has given to those inclined still to hope that peace would prevail in the councils of the Church! We are not surprised that those who saw the Holy Father pass from the Consistory describe him as having his countenance impressed with such stern sadness as it had never before exhibited. The act he had just done and the words he had just spoken were indeed sufficiently terrible to load any human countenance with clouds. It is not against Italy alone that the common father of the faithful has launched the anathema, but against the whole of civil society, against the modern world, against its laws, its morals, its constitution, its organization, its history, all that it is and all that it possesses. To take up only one passage of the allocation, let us consider only that one which touches the institution of civil marriages. The Italian law is upon that point more facile towards the Church than the French law, for, if we err not, it authorizes the religious prior to the civil law. But if the Pope, nevertheless, hurls such anathemas against the Italian law, what must he not have in reserve against the civil code of France, against that legislation which is the foundation of our society, and which is daily more and more becoming the model of universal legislation. Again, the Pope tells us that in those nations which have preserved the pure doctrines there flourish, necessarily flourish, good morals, integrity, peace, justice, charity and all the virtues. Ah! and what are those nations which, being sufficiently papal in love and obedience, may be pronounced to be nations after the Pope's own heart? We will look to only those two which have the most Roman bigotry and the least Christian faith or Christian conduct—Spain and Mexico. Is it in either of those nations, governed as papally as even the Pope can wish us to be governed, is it, we demand, that all or even one of the Christian virtues is in general practice, or even in general respect and acceptance? Assuredly the Pope could not very easily have selected a worse time than the present for an allocation, which, whether in its blame or its praise, is flatly contradicted by one or the other of all the great nations under heaven. What countries are more religiously free, more sternly, we had almost said more contemptuously independent of church, pope, archbishop, bishop, priest and preacher, than England and the United States? And if France has had its floods this year, has not Spain, the Pope's bigoted Spain, had to endure the same evil; and as to war and its kindred evils, during how many consecutive weeks in any one year of the last fifty has Mexico, papally, ultramontane and well-beloved by Rome, been free from its worst atrocities and meanest scoundrelisms? No doubt every pope must write and speak a considerable amount of nonsense, just as the proverb tells us that we must all eat a peck of dirt before we die. But Pio Nono seems to want all his peck at once; in this single allocation he has condensed injustice, untruthfulness and nonsense to supply all papal allocations from now to the year 1900.

Even superstition, that synonym of devotion, is arrayed against his holiness:

The Italians have a strong belief in the jettatore, or evil eye, and it is their belief that the Pope possesses it in an extraordinary degree. To such a pitch is this carried that not a few of the persons in his own household always take the precaution of wearing an amulet to avert the danger. It is this belief that helps to console the Italians for the harsh language used towards them by his holiness in his last allocation. Better this, they think, than to be blessed by him. He blessed Italy in 1848, and Italy was thrashed by Austria. He blessed Ferdinand II. of Naples, and all his family at Gaeta; the King died in the greatest torment, and his family lost everything. At Ancona he blessed three merchant vessels; they went down or were shipwrecked in their first voyage. He blessed Gen. Lamoriciere, who lost his well-earned reputation as a soldier at Gaeta, Eldardo, and Count Pimodan, who was killed there. He blessed the advocate Boggio, who was drowned at Lissa; not to mention the Empress of Mexico, and many others. This enumeration of mishaps sounds whimsical in our ears, but to the Italians it conveys the conviction that Pius IX is a jettatore. Being a jettatore is no stain on a man's character, for it is perfectly involuntary on his part, but it makes him a dangerous friend.

But while the Papacy is dying at the heart, it seems preternaturally alive at the extremities. Numbers of High Church Episcopalians are announced as leaving the English Church for Rome, and while despotic Europe is throwing off the shackles, Puritan New England is folding them to her embrace. Italy is jubilant that the Jesuits are expelled, and that the Pope is perishing, while Father J. T. Hecker demonstrates in Tremont Temple, to the gratification of Governor Andrew, Mayor Lincoln, R. H. Dana, etc., etc., that "The Republic advances over the ruins of orthodox Protestantism."

A Catholic has a religion that upholds the doctrine, that man is capable of self-government. The old religion and the new Republic are coming together, and the day is not far distant. The Church will find in the liberty and intelligence of the American people a welcome more worthy of her character. Catholicism is then here to perfect and sanction our institutions, and to make our land the land of the future.

THE TREASURE OF THE WICKED. Every man is treasuring up stores for eternity; the good are laying up "treasures in heaven where moth doth not corrupt," the evil and impatient are treasuring up "wrath against the day of wrath." What an idea is this? Treasures of wrath! Whatever the impatient man is doing is treasuring up wrath. He may be getting wealth; but he is treasuring up wrath. He may be forming pleasure connections; but he is treasuring up wrath. Every day adds something to the heap. Every oath the swearer utters, there is something gone to the heap of wrath. Every licentious act the lewd man commits, there is something gone to the treasure of wrath. Every day he lives in sin, the book of God's remembrance records it against him. The impatient man has a weightier treasure of wrath to day than yesterday; he will have a weightier to-morrow than he has to-day. When he lies down at night, he is richer in vengeance than when he rose in the morning. He is continually deepening and darkening his eternal portion. Every neglected Sabbath increases his store of wrath; every forgotten sermon adds something to the weight of punishment. All the checks of conscience, all the remonstrances of friends, all the advice and prayers of parents will be taken into account, and will tend to increase the treasures of wrath laid up against the day of wrath.—Rev. J. A. James.

The early French visitors to this continent used occasionally to carry back a few of the "native Americans" and at one time some forty or fifty of the Six Nations were sent to Paris. About 1830, a delegation of Indians was taken over on speculation, and about 1845 Mr. Catlin exhibited another party, under the especial auspices of Louis Philippe.

But all of these parties, from the first to the last, were demoralized by the vices of the French capital, and suffered from consequent disease, many dying. Now it is announced that a speculator is making arrangements for another party of "braves and squaws," to be taken to Paris, and there exhibited. Inquiry is to be made into the arrangement when Congress re-assembles.

The new volume of the British board of trade statistical table, gives the following statement of the population of countries with more than 10,000,000 inhabitants, according to the most recent census: United Kingdom, 258 persons to the English square mile upon an average; Italy, 225; France, 180; Prussia, 170; Austria, 155; Spain, (and Balearic Islands 84; Turkey, 19; United States, 11; Russia, 9; Russia in Europe, 31; Brazil, 3. The population of the eight above named States of the old world exceeds 270,000,000.

THE REAL GRIT.—A prominent Democrat of Hornellsville, N. Y., pledged himself before election, to one of the clergymen there, that if the Democrats were defeated, he would attend church every Sabbath for two years. He now declares that "he will stand the punishment like a man."

A pleasing novelty called "Lauza's Magic Ink," for autographs, visiting cards, secret writing, etc., has just been patented. By a simple manipulation the writing can be made to appear in gold, silver, bronze, scarlet, and other colors.

DECISION OF THE U. S. SUPREME COURT.

THE LAWYER'S TEST OATH CASE.

Mr. Justice Field having delivered the opinion of the court in the case of Cummings vs. the State of Missouri, proceeded to say: I am also instructed by the court to deliver its opinion in the matter of the petition of A. H. Garland. On the 2d of July, 1862, Congress passed an act prescribing an oath to be taken by every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the government of the United States, either in the civil, military or naval departments of the public service, except the President of the United States, before entering upon the duties of his office, and before being entitled to its salary or other emoluments. On the 24th of January, 1865, Congress passed a supplementary act, extending its provisions so as to embrace attorneys and counselors of the courts of the United States, which provides that after its passage no person shall be admitted as an attorney or counselor to the bar of the Supreme Court, and after the 4th of March, 1865, to the bar of any circuit or district court of claims, or be allowed to appear and be heard by virtue of any previous admission or any special power of attorney, unless he shall have first taken and subscribed the oath prescribed in the act of July 2, 1862.

The act also provides that the oath shall be preserved among the files of the court, and if any person take it falsely he shall be guilty of perjury, and upon conviction shall be subject to the pains and penalties of that offense. At the December term of 1860 the petitioner was admitted as an attorney and counselor of this court, and subscribed the oath then required by the second rule, as it then existed. It was only requisite to the admission of attorneys and counselors of this court that they should have been such officers for the three previous years in the highest courts of the States to which they respectively belonged; and that their private and professional character should appear to be fair. In March, 1865, this rule was changed by the addition of a clause requiring the administration of the oath in conformity with the act of Congress. In May, 1861, the State of Arkansas, of which the petitioner was a citizen, passed an ordinance of secession, which purported to withdraw the State from the Union, and afterward, in the same year, by another ordinance, attached herself to the so-called Confederate States, and by act of the Congress of that Confederacy she was received as one of its members.

The petitioner followed the State and was one of her representatives, first in the lower house, and afterward in the Senate of the Congress of that Confederacy, and was a member of the Senate at the time of the surrender of the Confederate forces to the armies of the United States. In July, 1865, he received from the President of the United States a full pardon for all offenses committed by him by participation, direct or implied, in the rebellion. He now produces this pardon and asks permission to continue to practice as an attorney and counselor of the court without taking the oath required by act of January 24, 1865, and the rule of this court, which he is unable to take by reason of the offices he held under the Confederate government. He rests his application principally upon two grounds—first, that the act of January 24, 1865, so far as it affects his status in the court, is unconstitutional and void; second, that if the act be constitutional, he is released from compliance with its provisions by the pardon of the President. The oath prescribed by the act is as follows: First, that the deponent has never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since he has been a citizen thereof; second, that he has not voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; third, that he has never sought, accepted or attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatsoever, under any authority or pretended authority, in hostility to the United States; fourth, that he has not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto; fifth, that he will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and will bear true faith and allegiance to the same. This last clause is promissory only and requires no consideration. The questions presented for our determination arise from the other clauses. These all relate to past acts. Some of these acts constituted, when they were committed, offenses against the criminal laws of the country, and some of them may or may not have been offenses, according to circumstances under which they were committed and the motives of the parties. The first clause covers one form of the crime of treason, and the affiant must declare that he has not been guilty of this crime, not only during the war of rebellion, but during any period of his life since he has been a citizen.

The second clause goes beyond the limits of treason, and embraces not only the giving of aid and encouragement to a treasonable nature to a public enemy, but also the giving of assistance of any kind to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States. The third clause applies to the seeking, acceptance or exercise, not only of offices created for the purpose of more effectively carrying on hostilities, but also of any of those offices which are required in every community, whether in peace or war, for the administration of justice and the preservation of order. The fourth clause not only includes those who gave a cordial and active support to the hostile government, but also those who yielded a reluctant obedience to the existing order established without their co-operation. The statute is directed against parties who have offended in any of the particulars embraced by these clauses, and its object is to exclude them from the profession of the law, or at least from its practice in the courts of the United States. As the oath prescribed cannot be taken by those parties, the act as against them operates as a legislative decree of perpetual exclusion. An exclusion from any of the professions, or any of the ordinary avocations of life for past conduct, can be regarded in no other light than as a punishment for such conduct.

The exaction of the oath is the mode provided for ascertaining the parties upon whom the act is intended to operate, and instead of lessening, increases its objectionable character. All enactments of this kind partake of the nature of bills of pains and penalties, and are subject to the constitutional inhibition against the passage of bills of attainder, under which general designation they are included. In the exclusion which the statute adjudges, it imposes a punishment for some of the acts specified which were not punishable at the time they were committed; and for all the acts it adds a new punishment to that then prescribed, and it is thus brought within the further inhibition of the Constitution against the passage of an ex post facto law. In the case of Cummings vs. the State of Missouri, just decided, we had occasion to consider at length the meaning of a bill of attainder and an ex post facto law in the clause of the Constitution forbidding their passage by the State, and it is necessary to repeat here what we then said. A like prohibition is contained in the Constitution against enactments of this kind by Congress, and the argument presented in that case against certain clauses of the Constitution of Missouri is equally applicable to the act of Congress under consideration in this case.

The profession of an attorney and counselor is not like an office created by an act of Congress, which depends for its continuance, its powers and its emoluments on the will of its creator, and the possession of which may be burdened with any conditions not prohibited by the Constitution. Attorneys and counselors are not officers of the United States. They are not elected or appointed in the manner prescribed by the Constitution for the election or appointment of such officers. They are officers of the court, admitted as such by its order, upon evidence of their possessing sufficient legal learning and fair private character. Since the statute of Henry IV, it has been the practice in England, and it has always been the practice in this country, to obtain this evidence by an examination of the parties. In this court the fact of the admission of such officers in the highest court of the States to which they respectively belong, for three years preceding their applications, is regarded as sufficient evidence of the possession of the requisite legal learning, and the statement of counsel moving their admission is sufficient evidence that their private and professional character is fair.

The order of admission is the judgment of the court that the parties possess the requisite qualifications as attorneys and counselors, and are entitled to appear as such and conduct causes thereon. From its entry the parties become officers of the court and are responsible to it for professional misconduct. They hold their office during good behavior, and can only be deprived of it for misconduct, ascertained and declared by the judgment of the court after opportunity to be heard has been afforded. Their admission and their exclusion are not the exercise of a mere ministerial power. The court is not in this respect the register of the edicts of any other body. It is the exercise of judicial power, and has been so held in numerous cases. It was so held by the court of appeals of New York in the matter of the application of Cooper for admission. Attorneys and counselors, said that court, are not only officers of the court, but officers whose duties relate almost exclusively to proceedings of a judicial nature, and hence their appointment may, with propriety, be entrusted to the courts. And the latter, in performing their duty, may very justly be considered as engaged in the exercise of their appropriate judicial functions.

In ex parte Secomb, a mandamus to the supreme court of the Territory of Minnesota to create an order removing an attorney and counselor, was denied by this court, on the ground that the removal was a judicial act. We are not aware of any case, said the court, where a mandamus was issued to an inferior tribunal, commanding it to reverse or annul its decision, where the decision was in its nature a judicial act, and within the scope of its jurisdiction and discretion. And in the same case the court observed that it has been well settled by the rules and practice of common law courts that it rests exclusively with the courts to determine who is qualified to become one of its officers as an attorney and counselor, and for what causes he ought to be removed. The attorney and counselor being, by the solemn judicial act of the court, clothed with its office, does not hold it as a matter of grace and favor; the right which it confers upon him to appear for suitors and to argue causes, is something more than a mere indulgence, revocable at the pleasure of the court, or at the command of the legislature.

It is a right of which he can only be deprived by the judgment of the court for immoral or professional delinquency. The legislature may undoubtedly prescribe qualifications for office, with which he must conform; as it may, where it has exclusive jurisdiction, prescribe qualifications for the pursuit of any of the ordinary avocations of life. But to constitute a qualification, the condition or thing prescribed must be attainable, in theory at least, by every one. That which, from the nature of things or the past condition or conduct of the party, cannot be attained by every citizen, does not fall within the definition of the term. To all those by whom it is attainable it is a qualification which operates as a perpetual bar to the office. The question in this case is not as to the power of Congress to prescribe qualifications, but whether that power has been exercised as a means for the infliction of punishment against the prohibition of the constitution.

That this result cannot be effected indirectly by a State, under the form of creating qualifications, we have held in the case of Cummings vs. the State of Missouri, and the reasoning upon which that conclusion was reached applies equally to similar action on the part of Congress. These views are further strengthened by a consideration of the effect of the pardon produced by the petitioner and the nature of the pardoning power of the President. The Constitution provides that the President shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States except in cases of impeachment. The power thus conferred is unlimited. With the exception stated, it extends to every offense known to the law and may be exercised at any time after its commission, either before legal proceedings are taken, or during their pendency, or after conviction and judgment. This power of the President is not subject to legislative control. Congress can neither limit the effect of his pardon, nor excuse from its exercise any class of offenders.

The benign prerogative of mercy reposed in him cannot be fettered by any legislative restriction. Such being the case, the inquiry arises as to the effect and operation of a pardon. On this point all the authorities concur. A pardon reaches both the punishment prescribed for the offense and the guilt of the offender; and when the pardon is full it releases the punishment and blots out of existence the guilt, so that, in the eye of the law, the offender is as innocent as if he never committed the offense. If granted before conviction, it prevents any of the penalties and disabilities consequent upon conviction from attaching. If granted after conviction, it removes the penalties and disabilities, and restores him to all his civil rights. It makes him, as it were, a new man, and gives him a new credit and capacity. There is only this limitation to its operation—it does not restore offices forfeited or interests vested in others in consequence of the conviction and judgment. The pardon produced by the petitioner is a full pardon for all offenses by him committed arising from participation, direct or implied, in the rebellion, and is subject to certain conditions which have been complied with. The effect of this pardon is to relieve the petitioner from all penalties and disabilities attached to the offense committed by his participation in the rebellion, so far as that offense is concerned.

He is thus placed beyond the reach of punishment of any kind. But to exclude him by reason of that offense from continuing in the enjoyment of a previously acquired right is to enforce a punishment for that offense, notwithstanding the pardon. If such exclusion can be effected by the execution of an ex parte oath, covering the offense, the pardon may be avoided, and that accomplished indirectly, which cannot be reached by direct legislation. It is not within the constitutional power of Congress thus to inflict punishment beyond the reach of executive clemency. From the petitioner, therefore, the oath required by the act of January 24, 1865, cannot be exacted, even were that act not subject to any other objection than the one just stated. It follows from the views expressed, that the prayer of the petitioner must be granted. The case of R. H. Murr is similar in its main features to that of the petitioner, and his petition must be granted, and the amendment to the second rule of the court, which requires the oath prescribed by the act of January 24, 1865, to be taken by attorneys and counselors, having been inadvisedly adopted, must be rescinded, and it is so ordered.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION, 1867.

The river Seine will flow past the door of the Exhibition, and a canal is now being constructed in the future park for the supply of water for industrial and ornamental purposes. These water-ways will afford admirable opportunities for the exposition of anything connected with maritime art, fisheries and aquatic sports; and this is another class in which it is to be hoped Englishmen will occupy a worthy place. Will not some enterprising individual—if not our noble National Life-Boat Institution—undertake to send an English life-boat with its crew and all accessories complete? Few things would do us greater honor, or be likely to confer greater benefit in the way of example.

Another feature, interesting to the whole world, is that of the illustration of the purely manual trades, including, however, not only those which defy the application of machinery—if, indeed, it be safe in this mechanical age for any one to forbid the intrusion or limit the powers of the lever, the inclined plane, and their offsprings,—but also others which are now running a competitive race against those giants of the nineteenth century, the steam engine, the steam hammer, the power loom, and the electric battery. It is the intention of the Imperial Commission to give all possible prominence to this group. They will show, if possible, the Indian weaving his exquisite shawls and fairy muslins; the Arab embroidering cloth and leather, and weaving camel's hair; the Maltese making those fairy chains and that minute flageolet-work which are the despair of other nations; the Chinese carving their ivory balls, fans, and artistic woodwork; the American Indian fabricating his skin dresses and moccasins, decorated with beads and porcupine quills; and the natives of Panama plaiting those well-known hats, in presence of which the Italian straw-worker and the French basket-maker, able as they are, must yield the palm. In short, the Commission will do their best to exhibit all the manual arts, as practised by Asiatic and less civilized people, side by side with the most approved methods of working adopted by the artisans of Europe. This is a grand scheme, and although, doubtless, many links will be wanting, it cannot fail to supply a series of most interesting and instructive industries. In order to finish the picture, to render the story and the means of comparison more complete, the manual workers will be brought as far as possible, face to face, with those who compete against them with the aid of machinery. Around the grand gallery of manufacturing machines, will be constructed a series of small workshops, in which the purely manual artisans will pursue their industry in their own manner, while their rivals, with the aid of the gubbed monster, steam, will exhibit to the world how far they excel or fall short, as regards excellence of workmanship on the one hand, and rapidity of execution on the other.

Another new feature is the introduction of the historic element into the industrial department.—A magnificent exhibition of retrospective art, founded upon that wonderful collection seen at South Kensington in 1862, was held last year in the Champs Elysees, when the great collectors of France contributed a most extensive and valuable series of specimens in metal, moulded, and woven wares, dating from the Flint Age to the century immediately preceding our own. Feeling that a great exhibition of modern art productions would be incomplete without the means of comparison with those of the past, the Commissioners have added another class to their programme, under the title of the "History of Labour," which, it is hoped, will comprise choice specimens of ancient art workmanship of every age and almost every country on the globe.

Literature and Science are also to have their place in the grand course. The Minister of Public Instruction, whose administration has been an unbroken series of strenuous and enlightened endeavors towards the improvement of all kinds of education—ordinary, ornamental, and professional—suggested the admission of the scholar, the man of science, and the teacher, to the great gathering; and it has been arranged that reports shall be made by a select number of eminent professors in all the classes of intellectual acquirement, to be published by the Government as the contributions of Literature, Education, and Science. The object is to show not only what progress France has made in letters and the abstract sciences, but also what position is due to her, in comparison with the rest of the world, as respects her collegiate, professional, and common systems of education. Other nations are invited to take like steps, and Italy, for one, has determined to respond to the appeal and put in her claim for one of the Academic wreaths.

Perhaps one of the most decided and generally recognized results of Exhibitions, great and small, is the fatigue of the visitor. The Imperial Commission intends to try the experiment of mixing the dulce with the utile to an extent not hitherto dreamt of, and thus to charm away at once mental and bodily weariness. As we have already said, the Exhibition building will stand in the midst of a large park, adorned with plantations and intersected by a canal. All the arts of the sculptor, the architect, the engineer, the iron, bronze, and zinc founder, the mason, and the rustic carpenter, in addition to those of the florist and horticulturist, will be called in to use to decorate the Exhibition Park with statues, fountains, picturesque objects, brilliant parterres, pleasant walks, and shady nooks; there is no doubt the result will be worthy of the occasion, and that the surroundings of the New Palace of Industry will present a striking contrast to those of its forerunners. But the intentions of the Imperial Commission do not stop here. Not content with providing their millions of visitors with a garden in which they may take their pleasure, it is proposed also to furnish the positive materials both of physical and intellectual enjoyment upon the most liberal scale.

The bodily wants are to be supplied by restaurants, cafes, confectioners' shops, and buffets for the sale of wines, beer, and other liquors, of every kind and country, each contractor being confined to the sale of articles, and the modes of cookery and preparation, peculiar to his country. The great wine districts of France are resolved to place before the world a supply of the wines of Burgundy, Bordeaux, Champagne, Macon, and the South, in unadulterated and perfect condition, and at fair charges. An Austrian establishment for the sale of the famous articles of Viennese bakery and confectionery is amongst those determined upon. There is little doubt that in the British department, roast beef, chops and steaks, and a good glass of beer, will be forthcoming; and there is no question that the able caterers of gastronomic delicacies for the Parisian world will do credit to their well established reputation. There will be little fear of being starved in the Great Exhibition of 1867.

Perhaps the greatest innovation of all is the introduction of dramatic and other amusements to take place not only during exhibition hours, but also in the evening, when it is said, the gates of the park will be thrown open to the public—perhaps with a small charge for admission.

The list of entertainments is to include, moreover, pantomimes, puppet theatres, and all kinds of diversions tending in any way to illustrate the intellectual condition or the national peculiarities of various nations.

In order to accommodate visitors, and enable them to spend as much time as possible in the Exhibition building and park, the subsidiary railways of Paris, which communicate with all the main lines, are being continued to the Champ de Mars, and trains will run from an early hour in the morning till midnight. This brings us to the grand question of the means of approach to the Exhibition, which in this respect also will have advantages which none other has ever possessed. The Champ de Mars is bordered by roads on all our four sides one of these being the broad highway that skirts the side of the river, while a fine bridge spans the Seine exactly opposite to the chief entrance of the park; thus the Exhibition will be accessible on all sides and in all directions by road, rail, and river, a combination of facilities which are of infinite importance in such an undertaking.

lastly, arrangements are made to provide as far as possible against bad weather. The side entrances to the Exhibition will be so arranged that visitors may there descend from their carriages under cover, and the broad paths which lead from the front and back gates of the park to the building will have covered arcades on each side.

Such are the principle improvements and most remarkable novelties that have been introduced into the plan of the great Congress of the works of Nature and Art for the coming year. The Imperial Commissioners seem determined to throw all that has hitherto been done of the same kind completely into the shade, and there is no legitimate reason to believe that they will not be successful in their undertaking.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

IN BOILING MEATS never put them in cold water, but plump them into that which is boiling briskly. This will coagulate the albumen on the outside, close the pores, and prevent the water from soaking out the rich juices. If salted meats need freshening, let it be previously done with cold water, taking all needed time, with frequent changing of the water, if it is very salt. Though cheap pieces of beef can be made tender and palatable as follows:—If salt, freshen as above. Put into the pot with a trifle more water than will finally be needed. Set into the top of the cooking pot a closely fitting tin pan or pan, and fill with cold water. If this gets boiling hot, dip out some and add cold water from time to time. Boil the meat until it gets so entirely tender that the bones will drop out, even if it takes five or ten hours. The steam and aroma or flavor of the meat, will be condensed on the bottom of the covering pan or pan of water, and drop back, and thus be retained. When thoroughly done, remove the cover, and slowly simmer down thick enough to jelly when cold. Dip out the meat, remove the bones, place it in a pan, pour over it the boiled liquid, lay over it a large plate, or inverted tin platter, and put on fifteen to thirty pounds weight. When cold, it will cut into nice slices, and if lean and fat or white meat be mixed, it will be beautifully marbled. The juice will jelly and compact it firmly together, and you will have nice, juicy meat, good for breakfast, dinner or supper, and so tender that poor teeth can masticate it. Fresh beef, or corned beef well freshened in cold water, may be used in this way with decided economy, and it is far superior to meat boiled in an open vessel from which the flavor has constantly escaped, as you can perceive by the odor all through the house, if Bridget leaves the kitchen door open a minute or two, as she will certainly happen to do.

CLEANING TRIPE.—In removing the stomach, be careful to keep the outside clean. Shake the contents well out through a small hole, and put in a quantity of unslaked lime about the size of a coffee cup, with about two gallons of water. Place it in a tub of water and agitate fifteen or twenty minutes, or until the lime is well slaked. A light scraping will then remove the inside skin. The slaking lime takes out all odor, and makes the tripe nice and soft. After cutting up and washing well it is ready for boiling, and may then be pickled in vinegar, or kept in salt water, to be changed daily and be cooked like sausage, or broiled like steak, buttered and peppered; or be dipped in batter and fried.

MASH, OR HASTY PUDDING.—Salt the water sufficiently, and, when boiling, stir into it sifted meal until two-thirds as thick as desired; then for the other third use coarse wheat flour, and boil a few minutes, stirring all the time. The secret of making corn meal palatable, whether in puddings of any kind, or in cakes or corn bread, lies in cooking it thoroughly. Whether pure meal, or part meal and flour, mix the hasty pudding very thin, and then cook it down by at least half an hour's boiling—an hour or more improves it. While about it, always make a large quantity so as to be sure to have a full supply to slice up and fry for breakfast. It is economical, and is relished by almost everybody.

FRIED CAKES.—Take one quart flour, two tablespoonfuls shortening (butter or lard), two tablespoonfuls vinegar, one teaspoonful soda, one teaspoonful salt, and warm water enough to fit the dough for rolling. In this case the vinegar takes the usual place of cream of tartar to set the carbonic acid free from the soda. We suppose the other ingredients are first thoroughly mixed with the flour, and the vinegar afterward added with water.

The Montgomery Mail makes fun of the State seal of Alabama, and gives a representation of the same in its columns.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 26th, 1867.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

To Travelling Preachers.

If there are any of the members of the patronizing Conferences, Superannuates, Supernumeraries, or effective, who by oversight have not received their paper, they will please advise us thereof stating their Post Office Conference and Circuit. And keep writing until the paper comes.

The Advocate to be Stopped.

Subscribers will not fail to remember that their ADVOCATE will cease to come to them unless they renew their subscriptions. We shall be sorry to part with them. Please call on your pastor at once, or write us by the next mail, inclosing three dollars. We most earnestly desire all the subscribers to stand by us. The ADVOCATE is a Church paper, represents all the interests of the Church as no outside paper can do. Stick to your own paper, and if you occasionally desire to see others, borrow one. "Excepting only the Bible and the devotions at the family altar, there is no greater power for good in the home circle than the religious newspaper. The parent who provides it for his family, or the pastor who secures its introduction into the homes of his people, accomplishes a good work, the influences of which are too precious for calculation."

To Advertisers.

This paper has for many years been well known in this community as the very best advertising medium by which the business men of the city could bring their merchandise, trades, professions, and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood when it is remembered that the four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States in the Rio Grand, East Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all, more or less active agents for the paper; and when it is also remembered that our paper circulates among a large class of people who seldom see any other New Orleans paper.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order; or at most of the large towns, post office receipts can be purchased.

THE NORTHERN ADVOCATE.

The organ of Northern Methodism in this city in the last issue varied its usual dullness by a prolonged leader that would have done credit to an Eastern Dervish. One is at a loss to decide whether it means rage, or pain, or is only the confused cry of genius extricating itself from the shackles of truth: If it be the last, which we are inclined to believe, the Editor has succeeded to admiration. We only wonder that so practiced a hand could not at least give the spice of novelty to his performance. But it is the stale statement of the well-known misrepresentation, that the forcible seizure, occupation, and retention of the Colored Churches in this city, of the M. E. Church, South, was by, and with the assent of that Church: though, as again and again stated, a positive, direct, protest was made by it to Gen. Canby in person, that such retention was in the face of justice, and the telegram of President Johnson.

Even the colored people begin to see that Northern Methodism is working behind the blind of a pretended board of Colored Trustees, in order to obtain legal possession of $55,000 worth of Southern property in this city.

That a Quarterly Conference of the Northern Methodist Church can appoint trustees for property it does not own, is too silly a pretence to deceive the most unlettered African. These Northern ecclesiastics work in the dark, and do not seem to be aware that our colored people know a mole-track. They see that while Trustees are colored, the M. E. Church, is white, and it is for that Church they are asked to hold property.

The recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the U. S. determine how far military processes are of force in civil cases, in times of peace; and the value of general orders signed by Gen. Canby, or any other General, ordering Boards of Trustees of the M. E. Church, South, to transfer property to Trustees of the M. E. Church, North. They determine whether a Mission Conference of Northern Methodism can hold churches from which they have, by military aid, ejected the Louisiana Annual Conference—churches which have been built by the labors and pastoral care of Southern Ministers. The time has about come for testing whether the courts of the country will sustain Northern Methodism in her hitherto protected Vandalism. There can be not the shadow of doubt upon this question; and as these gentlemen will have to go out, we advise them to make a grace of necessity. The audacity with which these Northern Travelling Preachers have held on to this property, long after the general disgorgement has taken place, will ever be a matter of sublime retrospect, in the war-history. The coolness with which Bishops Ames, Thompson, and Simpson, in virtuous succession, have by authority of Secretary Stanton, pirated this private property, which even in time of war was respected by the Law of Nations, and the express Proclamations of Commodore Farragut and Gen. Butler, as well as by the recent "Venice" decision of the U. S. Supreme Court, is only surpassed by the smooth-facedness with which they sit in these Churches and hold Conferences. These tremendous accessions of property in a year or two, must have appeared to be a wonderful missionary success to the praying part of Northern Methodism. But we hope that that Church will before the year ends, be taught by high authority the essential difference there is between the solid, proper success of true missionary effort, and the pillage of a foraging party of Northern Itinerant Preachers.

FAMILY PRAYERS.

Those associations among a people which find their basis in the house, hearth, or family are not only the most ancient but the most durable. Among the Greeks each family had its own sacred rites, celebrated by the master of the house, to which none but members of the family were admissible. And the extinction of a family, carrying with it the suspension of these religious rites, was held to be a national misfortune, not merely from the loss of the citizens composing it, but also because the family gods were thus deprived of their honors. So that with the most enlightened of the ancients the family hearth was founded upon a coalescence of the idea of worship with that of ancestry, or a communion in certain special religious rights with communion of blood. The broad light of the inspired Word sets forth this true conception and import of the family bond. In its earliest pages God treats with the human race through the heads of its families, and incorporates the idea into his own august name, as the "God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." It was as a father that God commended the obedience of the Patriarch: "For I know him, that he will command his children and his house after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment." On the other hand terrible was the visitation upon the High priest who did not check his wicked sons. God took away from the family the priesthood, involving the death of four score persons, the providences of an hundred years and the oath of the Most High. "I said indeed that thy house and the house of thy father should walk before me for ever; but now the Lord saith, Be it far from me: for them that honor me I will honor; and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed. Behold the days come that I will cut off thine arm and the arm of thy father's house, that there shall not be an old man in thine house." Higher sanctions than these for family religion could not be imagined. They establish the priesthood of every father, and an altar for every house. Whatever the fortunes of a family, this dignity and this duty may never be disregarded.

The Saviour recognized and emphasized the parental Priesthood. "Sir, come down ere my child die;" and, "Master I beseech thee look upon my son; for he is my only son," were appeals from which the Master did not turn away. "If thou canst believe," was his response—he can be cured. For Jesus was pre-eminently the Saviour of the House. His blessed presence was not unwelcome to the children. He took them up in his arms, and he welcomed those who brought young children to him, that he might bless them. How strange it is that men, fathers, can be found who disregard alike the teachings of nature and the light of Christianity; who rear no altar at home, and who do not formally recognize the Father of all before their household! No morning incense rises from that circle of immortal hearts, no evening song ascends to the Holy One "who giveth us richly all things to enjoy."

As a bower in paradise is the home where a father gathers around him the souls whom God has given and leads them in holy orison to heaven. Here religion is to be found in its purity and power, if anywhere. From this fountain streams go forth to refresh the whole land. Herein is the vitality and the enduring strength of the churches. This family—service may have, for the time, but little life in it, still it is an acknowledgment of our Heavenly Father; and sooner or later it will prove a blessing. But of all occasions we can conceive of none more likely to be favorable to ardent spiritual devotion. The very sight of the children is enough to call out the whole soul of a father in earnest prayer. The sickness, or even the absence of any of the dear ones will oftentimes move the depths of the heart toward God—how much more, moral peril, or death, or poverty, or the common struggles incident to a life whose phases and changes are all intended by God to this very end, the bringing of the whole family to himself. It seems to us if a man can pray any where it is in the midst of his family.

Many good people complain of difficulty in being sufficiently capable of leading twice a day in divine service so as to be always fresh and interesting, specially to the children. We suggest to such that to maintain this spirit of lively worship it is important to read every where in the scriptures, ranging throughout the Old and the New Testaments. Do not be confined to a regular order of lessons, much less do not read a chapter because the hinge of the book opens more readily there. But read so as to interest yourself, and you will interest others. There are many historical chapters in the Old Testament which the Holy Spirit has intended specially to interest children.

It is not here however, where the main difficulty is, but in prayer. The great cross of family prayer is how to pray. These stereotyped prayers fall heavily upon the ears and spirits of all. There should be variety in our daily prayers as there is in our daily providences.

"Lowly they bow'd adoring, and began Their orisons each morning duly paid
In various style; for neither varied style
Nor holy rapture wanted they to praise
Their Maker!"

This variety comes mainly from a growth in grace, which, like a walk in Eden, is always opening new vistas and kindling new delight. But besides that, the new chapter will always be suggestive of wants, or sins, or duties, or grace, or faith, or promise not before thought of, or then freshly impressed. Begin to pray right there; let the chapter lead you; bring your soul and your house to its light and guidance.

But I cannot pray out loud at all. Well, buy a book that has been prepared specially to obviate such a difficulty—"The Golden Censer," published by our book house. With this a youth can read the scriptures and lead the family in prayer.

The most enlivening and refreshing part of family worship we may not overlook. By the gift of Charles Wesley the Lord has laid every Methodist under obligation to sing. Who could omit those sweet syllables that breathe life into the dead! which in the early hours of the morning, lift our eyes—

"Up to the hills where Christ is gone."

And at eventide, hymn our thoughts to Him

"Who made both day and night;
Whose throne is darkness in the abyss
Of uncreated light."

Here the children join, in that grand ritual of song, here the angels listen; here, as he leads them in worship and stands by the altar, the father appears before his family in the true dignity and authority of its head; here the mother in the dew of her youth sits radiant with "the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning;" here, amid the "olive plants," the golden lamp of filial piety is lighted to burn brightly, and forever; and here, with infinite grace, abides the unseen Son of Peace. And upon these altars alone, as upon the strong stones of a foundation, there rests firmly the framework of all free, enlightened, and constitutional governments.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE LAWS AND GENERAL ORDINANCE OF THE CITY OF NEW ORLEANS, together with acts of Legislature. Decisions of the Supreme Court, and Constitutional provisions relating to the city government—Revised and digested by Henry J. Leovy. New Orleans. Bloomfield & Steel, Svo. 1866.

The compiler, as the result of great labor, presents a thorough digest of the vast mass of Law and Ordinance which city Legislation has hitherto produced. The work is one which every property holder and business man requires for daily reference. It is prefaced with an excellent succinct history of the settlement, growth, and political fortunes of Louisiana, extending from the first settlement of the French at Biloxi, until now. The paper, type, press work, and binding are highly creditable to the publishers.

DIUTERNITY, or the comparative age of the world, showing that the human race is in the infancy of its being, and the immense future duration of the world. By Rev. R. Abbey; Cincinnati, Applegate & Co., 1866. For sale by Rev. R. J. Harp, 112 Camp street, New Orleans.

Mr. A. is an immensely industrious thinker. He brings everything within the circle of his glass, by a number of successive observations, and is able to show that everything he sees has a direct influence and force upon what he is thinking about. In so many themes ingeniously woven in his general theory, there are many things of which one has but glimpses, the mind of the reader is entertained, but not wearied with protracted discussion. The general argument is, that there are too many things as yet untouched and undeveloped in the immense magazine of this world physical, and metaphysical, to warrant its speedy distinction—a great deal of coal as yet unconsumed; not to mention other combustibles. Which, by the by, might be cited the other way, as an evidence, that this immense store of fuel was in waiting to effect a speedy dissolution. This argument from the laws of nature as they are now to prove their long continuance in the future, has always seemed to us as fallacious as the argument from these same laws, to prove the period of their beginning. By such a rule it would be impossible to account for the first man. He must have had an origin, without growth, of mature manhood. And if man, then all nature must have come forth full orb'd, by the fiat of God. This is more philosophical, and certainly not so difficult to imagine as a long-drawn development of matter and mind, requiring precisely the same amount of creational power in the end. After a hard struggle, Science will probably accept the Apostle's solution of the difficulty of conceiving how the world was made: "Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear." As all men receive the philosophic wisdom of the latter part of this emulation, they will ultimately accept that of the former part. So we spine that the end of the world, the why and when of it, are equally matters to be apprehended by faith, and that the world will not end because the coal has given out, but from moral causes—coal or no coal.

The chapter on the Millenarian theory 79, 80, 81, etc., are excellent, but one would wish that the one entitled "The natural process by which children inherit piety," had not been written. On the whole, the work is the product of a fruitful, busy mind discussing many things in a very readable practical, and popular way.

FROM OTHER CHURCHES.

METHODIST CHURCH, NORTH.

The Baltimore Methodist Protestant says the denomination has completed nine new church edifices in the Maryland District, and laid the corner stones of four others during the past year. The church at Georgetown is soon to be remodeled, at a cost of several thousand dollars.

EPISCOPAL.

The Record states that the Bishop of Nova Scotia has dismissed from an important post in the city of Halifax, the Rev. J. C. Cochran, who has been forty-two years in orders, and the oldest officiating clergyman in the diocese except one—for refusing to preach in his surplice.

The following is attributed by an exchange to the Church Union, a new paper published in Brooklyn, New York:

"Old Trinity, in New York, has a tempest brewing. The Rector has introduced Processional Hymns with bowings and crossings before the altar, as another step towards Rome, and we know of more than one Vestryman who will not submit to them."

The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States is said to be divided into 2,300 parishes, having 2,530 clergymen and 161,225 lay members. During 1866 the members of this Church contributed $3,951,667 for charitable purposes.

The Right Rev. Wm. M. Greene, D. D., Bishop of Mississippi, has removed to Tennessee. We should like to hear of some good Churchman in Mississippi giving his Bishop a home within his diocese. —Columbus Sentinel.

RESTIVE UNDER FORMS.—In an account given of the Fulton street Prayer meeting, New York, in the New York Observer of last week, the following remarkable confession is given:

"Several clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church were present on successive days, and requested prayer for the blessing of God upon that church, that the spirit of holiness might be more abundantly showered upon its ministry and people. One said: 'I am a minister of that church, and we desire to be emancipated from the slavery of forms, and have liberty to pray to God in the use of such words as the Holy Spirit may dictate.'"

PRESBYTERIAN.

BEQUESTS.—The late Elizabeth Hoge, of Philadelphia, leaves $5,000 to the Trustees of the General Assembly of the O. S. Presbyterian Church, for the use of such disabled ministers and their families as the Trustees may designate; also, $3,000 to the Board of domestic Missions. The Presbyterian church in Litchfield, N. H., receives, by the will of the late James Parker, of that town, about $20,000, the interest to be used in maintaining preachers.

The Reformed Presbyterian Theological Seminary, located at Philadelphia, has opened its session with nine students; one of them from the United Presbyterian, and one from the Old School Presbyterian Church.

LUTHERAN.

The Lutheran Church at Martinsburg, (West V.) Rev. J. S. Heilig, pastor heretofore in connection with the Virginia Synod, rather than be disconnected from the General Synod, has preferred to attach itself to another District Synod, and on its own application was formally received into connection with the Maryland Synod, at its last session.

How complacent must the Northern church feel in the prospect of disintegration, progressing under their instigation—"ye compass sea and land, etc." Mat. 23, 15.

BAPTIST.

ANOTHER INSTITUTION SUPPORTED BY FAITH.—Dr. Cullis, of Boston, as we learn from the Watchman and Reflector, has opened a hospital for consumptive invalids, on the plan of Muller's orphan house. It is entirely supported by voluntary and unsolicited contributions, furnished in answer to prayer. At the close of the first year, the Doctor made the following entry: "In answer to prayer, the Lord has given, in cash, $5,916 28. Expenses, $5,916 28. Leaving no balance in the treasury." When Paul wanted money for the poor saints in Judea, he sent agents to collect it. I Cor. ix, 5. When Muller and Cullis want money, they simply ask God for it. Which is the better way?

LUTHER NOT AN IMMERSIONIST.—The Rev. Dr. Charles P. Krauth, of the Lutheran Church, has written a work of much interest on the subject of Baptism. Efforts have long been made by Baptists to claim Luther as an immersionist. Dr. Krauth has shown that he was not one in the sense claimed, though he did hold that the ordinance might be administered in that mode.

CHRISTIANITY AND HEATHENISM.—Rev. Henry Ward Beecher says: "Churches in the North crown every hill, and schools swarm in every neighborhood; while the South has but few scattered lights, at long distances, like light-houses twinkling along the edge of a continent of darkness." The United States census, as shown by the Atlanta New Era, presents the following facts: In 1850, there were 21,387 churches in the Northern States, and 16,658 in the Southern States. The proportion, one church to 628 persons in the North, and one church to 563 persons in the South. Yet the North was eminently enlightened and Christian, and the South was deplorable ignorant and heathen. "God, I thank thee that I am not  even as this publican."

The Rev. Dr. Cheever delivered a discourse in the Church of the Puritans, in New York, last Tuesday, on the right of the negro to vote. He deprecated the Constitutional amendment, and said that if the Southern States could see as he saw the privileges granted them in that document to trample anew upon the black race, they would accept of it.

CATHOLICS

The Roman Catholics in Boston are still at work buying up meeting-houses. The edifice corner of Clark and Hanover streets, and the brick church Chambers st., and the house formerly occupied by Mr. Ripley's society, also that on Union Park, all of them Unitarian, have passed into their hands. Dr. Lathrop's and the church on Summer street, also Unitarian, stand in the line of advancing business, and will be removed.

It is known that Roman Catholics are turning their attention to the wants of the freedmen, and propose to enter vigorously upon the work of their education. The matter was brought up for discussion and action before the recent great council of Catholic bishops assembled at Baltimore. A former colporteur of the Tract Society, and now a missionary of the Methodist Church in Western Georgia and Eastern Alabama, where he has access to thousands of freedmen, is asking for a large grant of publication, says:

"The colored people need something now to guard them against popery; for the Catholics of Georgia, Alabama and Florida are intending to make strong efforts to educate freedmen. If they do, they will make a great power of them. Their superstitious forms and pompous ceremonies will present a powerful attractive to the negro's mind. Protestants should be awake, and do what is in their power to keep them from falling into the hands of the Papists."

REMARKABLE MOVEMENT AMONG THE JEWS IN BOMBAY.—The Indian Portuguese, a Portuguese journal published in Goa, states that great excitement has been caused among the Jews in Bombay by the publication of their Pontiff, H. B. Koene, "member of the family of Aaron," who had lately come from Bombay to Jerusalem, of a pamphlet under the title, "The Voice of the Vigilant," the object of this "Voice" being to persuade the Jews that it is useless waiting any longer for the promised Messiah, as this is Jesus Christ himself, "whose doctrines have been spread all over the world without sword or force." The "Voice" is said to use arguments which are solid and conclusive. "Compare," says the Pontiff, "the Old and New Testaments and the truth will be seen." He also adds that he was born in the old law, and under it was elevated to the pontificate, but the light had already penetrated with its rays into the deep recesses of his mind, and he is therefore persuaded, and with well-founded reasons, that it is in vain that the Messiah is now looked for.

THE DEATH OF MRS. ANN GILBERT is announced in the Westeyn Times. Among the earliest of our recollections are the Original Poems of Ann and Jane Taylor, sisters of the late Isaac Taylor. Ann, in 1814, became the wife of the late Rev. Jos. Gilbert. Several hymns in our Hyion Book were from her gifted pen. We may give an extended notice of her in a future number.

FOREIGN.

ECCLESIASTICAL EXODUS FROM ITALY. The following intelligence from the Tyrol is published in the Augsburg Gazette:

"The number of monks and nuns who, quitting anti-monastic Italy, are arriving here to take shelter under the shadow of the Concordat, is so enormous that the convents are literally overflowing, and to make matters worse, we understand that these debris of the religious societies of Italy, blown hither by the storm of revolution, think of settling in our country. At Trent, and its neighborhood, six large houses are marked out as destined to receive the members of the various Italian Orders. An Brixen the Jesuits from Padua have bought an extensive property, where they intend to found a college and an institution for their pupils. Lastly, a Frenchman, Count de Broda, Grand Inspector of the Jesuits, has purchased, for the sum of 140,050fr., at Dornbirn, in Vorarlberg, a property which he has placed at the disposal of the Italian sons of Loyola."

NOVEL CHURCH.—London contains a novel church, and in a singular place. Opposite the semicircular row of buildings known as St. Paul's Churchyard, containing some of the finest shops in the metropolis, is an establishment of the largest kind in the dry goods line, employing at least a hundred persons. The enterprising and excellent proprietors have connected with the house a library and a chapel (a regular chapel, fitted up with seats, etc.) and employ an instructor (at $500 a year) whose duty it is to minister daily to this unique and most interesting congregation, preaching a short discourse, accompanied with prayers every morning. We read of "the church in the house," but here is one in a store; a preacher not to a university or senate, but to clerks and salesmen as such—a house of worship, an altar, a sacred desk in the midst of all the piles of broad-cloths, silks and satins.

LATEST NEWS.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 21.—Sixteen States have adopted the Constitutional Amendment.

The Commissioner of Agriculture has a letter from San Antonio, Texas, stating that there had been a terrible snow storm, with very cold weather, at that point on New Year's day. It adds that over 1000 sheep perished from the cold in that neighborhood.

The telegraph brings us intelligence of the death of that well known poet, critic and journalist, Nathaniel Parker Willis, who has been an invalid for several years. Mr. Willis was born in Portland, Me., on the 3d of January, 1807, and is consequently sixty years of age.

The Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee has authorized the statement that Congress will do nothing this session towards the impeachment of the President. The Committee are busy closing the other investigations, including the alleged complicity of Jefferson Davis in the assassination conspiracy. If they get through in time they may take some testimony on impeachment for the purpose of laying it before the next Congress.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22.—11 o'clock p. m.—The capital has been thrown into a state of extraordinary excitement to-day by the monstrous character of some of the Congressional proceedings.

At about one o'clock in the afternoon, Boutwell, of Massachusetts, reported from the judiciary committee a bill to nullify the decision of the Supreme Court in the test oath case.

He introduced the revolutionary measure with a speech of even unwonted violence and vituperation. This created great agitation and manifest mortification among members of all shades of opinion, while it drew from the negroes and their friends and sympathizers in the galleries characteristic whoops of applause.

Several members made brief replies to the tirade of Boutwell, and since that time the whole city has been the theater of the most vehement and wildest excitement.

The discussion in the House continued till long after the usual dinner hours, and the consequence was that between chagrin at the proceedings and natural impatience at being so inconvenienced by their protraction, so many members left that there was at last found to be no quorum present.

A motion was then made, and of course carried, by the partisans of the bill who had remained, that the sergeant-at-arms and his assistants should be sent after absent members, to arrest them, and bring them to the bar of the House. The necessary writs were accordingly issued, and about forty members were arrested, brought to the bar, fined and mulcted in the expenses or fees attendant on the process.

Mr. Hise, of Kentucky, was one of those arrested, and he was taken from his bed. In reply to the formal inquiry about the cause of his absenting himself from the proceedings of the House without leave, he pleaded disgust at the proceedings; he had been compelled to witness and ostensibly to share. Thereupon it was proposed by one of the partisans of the bill that he should be fined a thousand dollars. Eventually, however, he was discharged on the same terms as other arrested members had been.

The doors of the House were then, on motion of one of the partisans of the bill, ordered to be closed, so as to prevent the egress of any member without the express permission of the House. Dinner was served on the floor of the House by colored waiters, the House continuing in session all the time, and much pleasantry being indulged in notwithstanding all the offensiveness and irksomeness to which so many had found themselves subjected.

The conservative members are strenuously employing all available parliamentary resources for the purpose of defeating this iniquitous and revolutionary attempt. Up to 9 o'clock to-night the ayes and noes had been called twenty times.

What stamps the proceedings in reference to this outrageous bill with the most shameful characteristics is that it has not been printed and is "sprung" upon the country without a word of notice; while the attempt to impose a decision of law upon the Supreme Court is universally considered among statesmen, lawyers, and the people, as the most extraordinary event in the whole history of the country.

The House is still in session at 11 p. m., and will most probably remain so until morning.

The President's Washington evening organ of the 9th inst., says of the administration:

"If necessary, its strong arm and iron hand will be invoked to stay the course and prevent the consummation of radical treason. The great oath of the President to protect and defend the Constitution will not be forgotten, and the people who sustain him with their 500,000 majority of the voting population North and South, will not forget him. Events have already brought the government to the very verge of another revolution. If the radical majority in Congress pursues its treasonable course much longer the governments, in order to sustain itself, will have to arm its supporters. At the call of the President, all his friends, North and South, and the army and navy, will respond. In such a contest, the issue cannot be doubtful. Congressmen may be valiant fighters on the floor of Congress, but when they come to lead their cohorts into the field, it will be another thing. The real armies and great soldiers of the republic will be found fighting under the flag. We advise the opposition of the determined and fixed fact that Andrew Johnson will serve out his constitutional term of office."

The President is declared to have stated that the country is in the greatest danger of being forced into a revolution, if not immediately on the eve of it, the necessary consequence of apparent determination of the Congressional oligarchy to override the rights, powers and privileges of the other co-ordinate branches of the government, the executive and the judicial. This, of course, he is reported to argue cannot be submitted to by the people and he avers they must awake to the sense of the destruction which immediately threatens their liberties, if they are desirous of preserving them. This is the purport of the expressions of opinion attributed to the President upon fair authority. How far they are exact remains to be seen.

Gen. Sheridan has been telegraphed for to come to Washington.

CITY NEWS.

The arrival of a steam plow, harrow and cultivator, from Leeds, Finland; imported by the enterprising house of Longstreet, Owen & Co., has been duly chronicled in the Times. Also the fact that a thorough trial of the machine would take place at the Fair Grounds, Gentilly Road, during the present week.

Yesterday steam was raised, the plow attached to the engine, the harrow behind the plow, and the whole moved through the streets from the levee, in the Fourth District. Everything worked smoothly for a short distance, when one of the wheels came off, letting the axle on the ground, but so perfect is the machine under control, that the whole gang was halted before it had dragged a foot. It was found that by an oversight the Linch pin had not been put in. This was soon remedied, and the engine once more set in motion. The route selected was down Carondelet street, on which a halt was made near the corner of Gravier, and the plow inspected by thousands of curious and interested persons. Various and conflicting were the opinions expressed as to the utility of the immense mass of iron which composes the different implements, but this matter will soon be set at rest by actual test.

After a brief stay, the machine was again got under way, turning from Carondelet in to Canal street, thence to Broad, thence to Gentilly road and the Fair Grounds.

The trip of this steam plow through the city yesterday morning has certainly demonstrated one thing, even if the plow itself should prove a failure, viz: That steam can be applied to propelling heavily laden vehicles in crowded streets in perfect safety. In fact, become a substitute in a great measure for horse and mule flesh.

MARRIED.

At the parsonage of the Dryades street German Church, Jan. 23d, 1867, by the Rev. J. B. A. Ahrens, Mr. N. Wirtz to Miss M. Wundt.

On the 14th of November, by Rev. Francis Walker, Mr. JOHN D. DEARING to Miss SUSAN WILLIAMS, all of Marianna, Florida.

OBITUARIES.

Died, on the eleventh of Dec, 1866, in Macon, Noxubee county, Miss., Mrs. E. D. MACON, aged about 87 years.

Born in the city of Columbia, S. C., in the year 1780, but "born again" in her 18th year, this "mother in Israel," was for sixty-nine years "a pillar in the temple of our God," and grew as "the cedar of Lebanon" in the courts of the Lord's House.

The preaching of the word, prayer-meeting, and more specially class-meeting, were the delight of her soul. The word of the Lord would drop as the very honey from the rock, upon her receptive spirit, and sweet anticipations of the heavenly joy were often obtained. The text, and the discourse of the preacher were treasured in her memory, and even from the feeblest efforts of God's servants, "Mother Macon," possessed the happy art of extracting some sweet morsel of holy comfort.

The writer can never forget the seasons of sacred profit he has spent with her in the class-room; for unlike many Methodists of these days, "Mother Macon" never found it convenient to disperse with class-meeting. She had made much progress in Christian life, but this aged saint never graduated from the class-room; until God took her to the rest of her fathers. Her religion was not gloomy or sombre, but, on the contrary, was of a most cheerful type, and even persons youthful and buoyant, could find nothing repulsive in the religious life of "Mother Macon."

The result of the war, left our Mother almost penniless, as most of her possessions consisted of slaves, whom she treated with the utmost kindness. About the only wealth she possessed at "the surrender" was a blissful assurance of a heavenly home, and the ardent attachment of a large circle of relatives and friends, most of whom had learned, amid our national tribulations, to admire her calm and trustful spirit more than ever.

The ministers who have preceded me in this station, will readily join me in the assertion, that our sainted Mother Macon, had, during all the years of her residence here, moved among us as the very embodiment of a consistent and holy life.

Her death was sudden, but this "wise virgin" had her lamp well trimmed and burning, and with holy joy has she met the Bridegroom.

"The pains of life are past,
Labor and sorrow cease,
And life's long warfare closed at last,
Her soul's found in peace."

SPECIAL NOTICES.

BLACKMAN'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE.—Penmanship, bookkeeping, arithmetic, English, French, Spanish and German are practically taught by experienced professors at the celebrated Commercial College of J. W. Blackman, corner of Carondelet and Canal streets. Mr. Blackman, the principal of this school, has been teaching in this city since 1851, and has done good service in giving to our young men engaged in, and preparing to enter into commercial pursuits, a sound and practical knowledge of their profession. Besides the regular college rooms, an apartment is provided for private lessons for gentlemen, and also one for ladies. Parents and guardians would do well to call and examine the workings of this institution, which is open day and night throughout the year.

NEW SOUTHERN MUSIC BOOK.

Just published

TABOR;

Or the Richmond Collection of Sacred Music.

By R. MCINTOSH, of Virginia.

The attention of Choirs and Musical Societies generally is respectfully asked for this new and popular collection of Church Music. The author for four years an officer in the Confederate Army composed many pieces in moments snatched during his marchings and counter-marchings. The dirge at the funeral of Gen. T. J. Jackson (Stone-wall) May 17, 1862, was from his pen, and is included in this collection.

Says the Richmond Whig: "The writer is well known throughout the South as an author of finished excellence; a musical reputation rarely attained—at the head of Church Music; no one disputing the position with him, and beside it, and ever has been, one of us."

Says the Spartanburg (S. C.) Express: "After a careful examination of Tabor, we have no hesitation in pronouncing it a Musical Gem. Its original compositions give the work a distinctive character, while the selections embrace those good old tunes which have come down from our fathers as an invaluable legacy. Here, also, may be found a number of traditional melodies, which, for half a century or more, have been sung throughout the South and Southwest, and never before in print. We can heartily recommend it to Classes, Choirs, and all lovers of Sacred Music."

It has been largely introduced and highly recommended by many of the Churches in Richmond and Petersburg, where the author is best known. It embraces all the metres in use, in every key and variety of measure, with a full elementary department and the collection of new anthems, set pieces, and sentences it can thus nearly 300 closely printed pages, neatly and tastefully gotten up, well printed and bound.

Price—retail, $1.33; $1.00 per dozen. Can be obtained through all booksellers, or will be mailed by the Publishers to any of the United States, post free, on receipt of retail price.

J W BRADLEY'S
DUPLEX ELLIPTICAL
[Or, Double Spring]

SKIRT!

THEY WILL NOT BEND OR BREAK
Like the Single Spring, but will preserve their perfect and graceful shape when three or four ordinary skirts are thrown aside as useless—hence are the CHEAPEST.

Each Hoop is made by braiding two springs together, edge to edge, forming the STRONGEST, most FLEXIBLE, and still the LIGHTEST Hoop made.

In fact, for promenade, or the house, or the church, the theatre, or for crowded assemblies, railroad cars, carriages, etc., they are superior to all others, affording COMFORT TO THE WEARER, with that ELEGANCE OF SHAPE which wins favor with all, and has made this "DUPLEX ELLIPTIC".

The Standard Skirt of the Fashionable World.
For misses and young ladies they are superior to all others.

For Sale Everywhere.

Manufactured exclusively by the owners of the Patent.

WEST, BRADLEY & CARY,
97 Chambers, 79 and 81 Leade sts, New York.

CAUTION.

The Duplex Skirt will admit a pin being run through the centre of each hoop, thereby proving there are TWO SPRINGS braided together, which is the secret of their remarkable STRENGTH and FLEXIBILITY—a combination not possessed by any SINGLE SPRING Skirt.

The retail stamp, viz: "J. W. BRADLEY'S Duplex Elliptic Skirt," will be found upon the waistband of every skirt; none other are genuine.

CENTENARY COLLEGE,

Jackson, Louisiana.

was established by the State of Louisiana in 1825, and transferred to the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1845. It is now under the joint patronage of the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences.

The College exercises were necessarily suspended during the war; but were regularly resumed after reorganization, on the first Monday in October, 1865. The approaching session will open on the first Monday of October next.

Tuition, $75 per annum, payable semi-annually, in advance.

Boarding can be obtained at from $20 to $25 per month.

The buildings, Libraries, Apparatus, Laboratory and Society Halls, the location in point of beauty, health, ease of access and good society, are unsurpassed by those of any institution in the Southern States.

The past history of the College is the pledge of its future prosperity.

The Board and Faculty promise the public that nothing shall be wanting on their part to secure the thorough education of the young men committed to their care, in both Preparatory and Collegiate Departments.

The old students, alumni, and friends of the Institution, are requested to give publicity to the full reorganization and opening of the College, as stated above.

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE AT

BATON ROUGE.

The ninth session of this school will begin on Wednesday, 3d October, 1866.

The object of the school has ever been to afford a good classical and practical education, or complete preparation for any stage of a College or University course.

Every student who enters the school is expected to remain to the close of the session in July, and will be held liable for the bills in all cases, unless protracted illness shall compel his removal.

Pupils are required to furnish their own bed clothing, towels, wash-basin, mosquito-bar, etc.

Circulars can be obtained by addressing me at Baton Rouge, or Rev. J. C. Keener, D.D., New Orleans, La.

As the number of students is limited, it is earnestly requested that application be made as soon as possible.

Cartes de Visite,

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

Since the issue of our last publication the general market has exhibited considerable activity, and several of the leading articles have undergone a quotable variation. Sugar and Molasses have been active, at steady prices, and the movement in Western Produce has been quite liberal, attended with a material improvement in Flour, Corn, Oats, Hay and Pork; while operations in our leading staple have been of a restricted character, and prices have eased off, in consequence of less favorable advices from Liverpool and New York, the market closing yesterday with a tendency to increased weakness.

COTTON—On Saturday, owing to the increased firmness of holders, and the decided indisposition of buyers to operate naked at concessions, the movement continued light throughout, resulting in sales of barely 2600 bales at previous prices. Early on Monday the same influence prevailed, but later in the day factors gave way, and sales to the amount of 3850 bales were effected, at easier prices. Yesterday, owing to the publication of erroneous dispatches in the morning papers, announcing a heavy decline in Liverpool, the market opened unusually dull, and notwithstanding later advices corrected the error, yet buyers, in view of the unfavorable position of Exchange, evinced little desire to operate, and consequently the day's transactions were light, footing up at the close barely 2750 bales, at easier prices, the market closing at our quotations, with a softening tendency.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 15,943 bales, against 15,505 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 438 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 416,611 bales, against 398,931 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 126,878 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 104,238 bales to Great Britain, of 14,686 to France, and an increase of 9475 bales to other foreign ports.

TOBACCO—In request, but the offerings are too light for extended operations, and only small sales have been made since our last weekly review, at firm and full prices. The receipts of the new crop are light and have sold readily, while the stock on hand of the old crop is very small, and the desirable descriptions are selling rapidly. The market is very firm and prices are looking up, but for the present we continue to quote:

FLLOUR—A good local demand has prevailed since our last review, and the supplies being light, prices have still further advanced at least 25c per barrel. There were sales, mostly to dealers, on Saturday and Monday, of 4800 barrels at $10 for Common, $10 35 to $11 for Fine, $11 75 to $12 for Superfine, $12 to $12 50 for Single Extra, $12 75 to $13 50 for Double Extra, $13 75 to $14 75 for Treble Extra, and $15 to $16 per barrel for Choice. Yesterday there was again a good demand, and with a light stock on hand prices were very full and tending upward. The sales embraced 2500 barrels, in lots, at $12 75 for Common, $13 to $13 75 for Fine, $14 to $14 25 for Superfine, $14 75 to $15 75 for Double Extra, and $15 50 per barrel for Choice. Arrived during the past three days 2800 barrels. Cleared for Florida 194, Texas, Vera Cruz 510, Nassau 5 barrels—total, 3172 barrels.

THE BURIAL OF MOSES.

By Neho's lonely mountain,
On this side Jordan's wave,
In a vale in the land of Moab,
There lies a lonely grave;
And no man dug the sepulchre,
And no man saw it e'er;
For the angel of God returned the sod
And laid the dead man there.

That was the grandest funeral
That ever passed on earth;
But no man heard the trumping,
Onward the train go forth,
Noiselessly in the daylight Comes when the night is lone,
And the crimson streak on ocean's cheek Grows into the great sun.

Noiselessly in the spring-time
Her crown of verdure waves,
And all the trees on all the hills
Open their thousand leaves—
So, without sound of music
Or voice of them that wept,
Sifted down from the mountain's crown
The great procession swept.

Perchance the bald old eagle
On gray Beth-peor's height,
Out from his rocky eyrie
Looked on the wondrous sight;
Perchance the lion, stalking,
Still shuns that hallowed spot;
For beast and bird have been and heard
That which man knoweth not.

But when the warrior dieth,
His comrades in the war,
With arms reversed and muffled drum,
Follow the funeral car;
They show the banners taken,
They tell his battles won,
And after him lead his masterless steed,
While peals the minute gun.

Amid the noblest of the land
Men may lay the sage to rest,
And give the hand an honored place,
With costly mangled dress,
In the great minister's transept,
Where lights like glory fall,
And the choir sings and the organ rings
Along the emblazoned wall.

This was the bravest warrior
That ever buckled sword;
This the most gifted poet
That ever breathed a word;
And never earth's philosopher
Traced with his golden pen,
On the deathless page, truth half so sage
As he wrote down for men.

And had he not high honor?
The hill-side for his pall,
To lie in state while angels wait,
With stars for tapers tall,
And the dark rock-pines like tossing plumes
Over his bier to wave,
And God's own hand, in that lonely land,
To lay him in the grave!

In that deep grave without a name,
Where his uncoffined clay
Shall break again (most wondrous thought!)
Ere the judgment day,
And stand with glory wrapped around
On the hills he never trod,
And speak of the strife that won our life
With the incarnate Son of God!

Only tomb in Moab's land!
O dark Beth-peor hill!
Speak to these curious hearts of ours,
And teach them to be still.
God hath his mysteries of grace—
Ways that we cannot tell;
He hides them deep, like the secret sleep
Of him he loved so well.

THOUGHTS SUGGESTED BY BANKS' HISTORY OF THE POPES.

The Popes for a long period prior to the Reformation, and for several Pontificates after it began, were more devoted to their political interest in Italy than to the general interest of the Church throughout Christendom. Each Pontiff seemed mainly anxious to aggrandize his family, by elevating the several members of it to offices—by conferring princely titles, and intermarrying them with Ducal and Royal houses. This line of policy drew the Popes into political complications, intrigues, and conflicts. When the reforming spirit was evoked and went forth under the auspices of Luther, it found the Popes too much engrossed with their schemes of ambition, to give it the attention which its importance demanded. When the Emperor, Charles V, animated by Catholic zeal, would have taken active measures to maintain and restore the unity of the Roman faith, and to stay the rapid and victorious march of Protestantism, the Popes threw the weight of their influence into the scales in favor of Charles' great rival, Francis the I, of France; so that the Emperor felt himself too weak to attack, or even incur the displeasure of the Protestant Princes. For this reason, it was, Protestants were left alone until they had spread the knowledge of their doctrines, and had established churches throughout Christendom.

Forty years after the outbreak of the Reformation, Pius IV. ascended the papal throne. He saw at a glance the impolicy, selfishness and narrowness of view, which had marked the administration of his predecessors, in making war on the enemies of Christendom, and in seeking the elevation and glory of their families, rather than the extension, perpetuity, and power of the Church; whose visible and accredited heads they were. Pius and the Pontiffs who succeeded him, ceased to make war on kings, and to devote the power of their high position to family aggrandizement. Pius and his immediate successors acted in zealous co-operation with Catholic Princes in their efforts to resist, to overthrow, and extirpate Protestantism from their several kingdoms.

The Popes approved of, and gave aid and comfort, to the ferocious measures of the Inquisition—the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and the violent measures of the merciless Philip II, of Spain—the persecuting measures of the Emperor and Roman Princes, of Germany—and the invasion of England. The Popes especially aided the Jesuits with commendation, influence and gold. The Popes now spent the revenues formerly devoted to war, and family aggrandizement, in public enterprises, for the maintenance and propagation of the Roman faith.

As a result of this marked change in papal policy—about fifty years after the dawn of the Reformation, the Roman world roused itself to make a great, determined, and persistent effort, to check the progress of Protestantism, and recover, if it might, its great losses.

The causes and agents of this great movement were various. First among these, we may note Protestantism itself, as one of the most efficient. The zeal, purity, and consequent success of the Protestant clergy and laity, demonstrated the necessity of a like state of things in the Roman Church. Under this new impulse, strictness and devoutness became the order, and fashion, from the Pope to the humblest monk.

The next circumstance that contributed to the revival of Romanism, was the creation and organization of various orders of priests and monks; the most famous and efficient of all, being the "Society of Jesus," founded by the Spanish Knight Loyola, who, after being wounded, and his personal beauty marred, turned a religious fanatic, and practiced the severest austerities, but afterwards becoming more sobered, he studied theology at Paris, and then organized his company, which was formerly recognized by the Pope. This society was unlike any religious society in the Roman Church. They had no uniform, practiced no special austerities—conformed themselves to all modes of life, but were absolutely and unhesitatingly (like soldiers) obedient to their superiors, and went without a word to any part of Europe, Asia, or America, when ordered so to do. Their principal business was to teach—to act as confessors to the great, and to preach, and to controvert. Their influence soon became great, and widely extended. They became the advisors of nearly all the Princes holding the Roman faith, directing their counsels in all ecclesiastical affairs, and often advised the most cruel measure against the Protestants.

Another agent for the check and extirpation of Protestantism, and consequent advance of Romanism, was the Inquisition, which in Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Holland, numbered its victims by tens of thousands. This institution, by most atrocious and unheard-of cruelties, sought to crush out the last vestige of Protestant opinions. The Inquisition in its earliest days, was no respecter of persons. Arch Bishops and noblemen lost their lives for heresy, as the Inquisitors called all opinions that varied from their own; the measure of heresy was divergence from them. All books and writings which contained sentiments that could be construed to mean anything different from the Roman faith, were condemned and burnt.

And lastly, as the agents of this revival of Romanism in the latter part of the sixteenth century, may be reckoned the reigning Princes, holding the Roman faith. These, urged by the advice of the Pope, and his aids—the Jesuits and aided by their gold, used all their power to banish Protestantism from their kingdoms. Protestants were expelled from office—were denied the right of worship, and multitudes suffered confiscation, cruel bonds, banishment and death, for the testimony of Jesus.

Let us, as Protestant Christians, remember that our weapons are not carnal, but spiritual, and mightily through God, to the pulling down the strongholds of Satan.

Let us remember, too, that Rome boasts that she never changes, and can now consistently persecute that which she calls heresy—and that she only needs power to make us feel it. Let us publish Bibles, circulate religious truths, build churches, and sustain faithful ministers set for the defence of the gospel.

SIR WM. ROWAN HAMILTON ON THE ASCENSION.

Hamilton had, at one time, serious intentions of entering the Church, and was, more than once offered ordination. The following letter, written to the Editor of the Irish Ecclesiastical Journal, and published in that work, contains a very singular attempt to elucidate one of the grandest questions connected with the Christian religion:

"ON THE ASCENSION OF OUR BLESSED LORD.
Whitson Eve, 1842.

"Sir.—The meditations of a Christian, at this sacred season, turn naturally on that seeming pause in the operations of divine Providence when, as at this time, the disciples who had seen their Lord parted from them, and taken up into heaven, were waiting at Jerusalem for the promised coming of the Comforter. You will judge whether the following remarks, in part confessedly conjectural, but offered (it is hoped) in a no presumptuous spirit, may properly occupy any portion of your columns, in connexion with the events which the Church at this season commemorates.

"It may be assumed that your readers are disposed to adopt, in its simplicity, the teaching of the 4th article, that 'Christ did truly rise again from death, and took again his body, with flesh, bones, and all things appertaining to the perfection of Man's nature; wherewith he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth, until he return to judge all Men at the last day.' They will not be inclined to explain away the doctrine of the Ascension of the Lord's Humanity, into what some sought to substitute for it,—a ceasing of the Godhead to be manifested in the person of Christ. Far rather will they be ready to believe that the 'glorious' Ascension was the epoch of a more bright manifestation of God in Christ, than any which had been vouchsafed before though perhaps rather to angelic than to human beings; and that no merely figurative, though in part a spiritual sense, is to be assigned to those passages of Holy Writ, which speak of Jesus as having been highly exalted, and seated at the right hand of God. As God, indeed, we know that Heaven, and the Heaven of Heavens, cannot contain him; yet it is also declared that Heaven is His Throne, and Earth is His Footstool; and Scripture and the Church seem to attest alike, that the risen and glorified Humanity of Christ is now seated, as in some holiest place, where God is eminently manifested, eminently worshipped; his power, his name, and his presence dwelling there.

"A local translation of Christ's Body being thus believed, it is natural to believe also that this change of place was accomplished in time, and not with that strict instantaneousness which may be attributed to a purely spiritual operation. Accordingly we read that at least the first part of the act of Ascension,—the part of which the Apostles were witnesses,—was gradual, their gaze could follow for a while their ascending Lord; nor was it instantly, though it may have been soon, that a cloud received him out of their sight. And to suppose that the remainder of that wonderful translation was effected without occupying some additional time, seems almost as much 'against the truth of Christ's natural Body,' as that it should be at one time in more places than one; which latter notion a rubric of our Book of Common Prayer rejects as error and absurdity. The Cloud which hovered over Bethany was surely not that Heaven where Jesus sitteth at the right hand of God; and to believe that his arrival, as Man, at the latter, was subsequent to his arrival at the former, seems to be a just as well as an obvious inference, from the Doctrine of the Ascension of His Body.

"But how long 'was it subsequent?' We dare not, by mere reasoning, attempt to decide this question. That place to which the Saviour has been exalted, and which, although in one sense 'Heaven,' is in another sense declared to be 'far above all heavens,' may well be thought to be inconceivably remote from the whole astronomical universe; no eye, no telescope, we may suppose, has pierced the mighty interspace; light may not yet have been able to spread from thence to us, if such an effluence as light he suffered thence to radiate. And, on the other hand, it must be owned, that, vast beyond all thought of ours as the interval in space may be, Christ's glorious Body may have been transported over it, in any interval of time, however short.

"Reason is silent there; nor can we expect to find, on this point, a clear revelation in Scripture; but do we meet with no indications? Does Holy Writ leave us here entirely without light? I think that it does not; and shall submit to you a view, which it seems to me to suggest.

"First, it is clear from Scripture, that the Ascension of Christ had been entirely performed before the Descent of the Spirit on the Day of Pentecost. Thus, in a well-known verse of that sixty-eighth Psalm, which the Church has connected with the Service for Whitsunday, and which St. Paul has quoted in reference to the Ascension; in the first sermon of Peter to the Jews; and in other passages of the Bible: the obtaining of gifts for men, the receiving from the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, is spoken of as a result or consequence of Christ's having ascended up on high—having been exalted by the right hand of God,—having ascended, as did not David, into the Heavens. The act of ascending occupied therefore no longer time than that from Holy Thursday to Whitsunday.

"But may it not have been allowed to occupy so long a time as this?

No reason a priori can be given against the supposition; no passage of Scripture, no decision of the Church, so far as I know, is against it. The very close connexion announced, in the texts above alluded to, between the Ascension of Christ into Heaven, and the Descent of the Holy Ghost upon Earth, appears to me an indication in its favor. For the purely spiritual nature of the latter descent prevents the necessity, almost the possibility, of our supposing it to have occupied time at all. No sooner, it may reasonably be thought, did Jesus take his seat at the right hand of God, than the Spirit fell upon the Apostles. The finished work, of ascending up on high, may have been followed instantly by the receiving of gifts for men.

"Should this conjecture be admitted, of the Ascension not having been completed till the Day of Pentecost, although commenced ten days before, it might suggest much interesting meditation respecting the 'glory,' the great triumph, with which our Saviour Christ was then exalted into God's Kingdom of Heaven. May not the transit from the Cloud to the Throne have been but one continued passage, in long triumphal pomp, through powers and principalities made subject? May not the 'Only Begotten Son' have then again been brought forth into the world,—not by a new Nativity, but (as it were) by Proclamation and Investiture,—while the Universe beheld its God, and all the Angels worshipped him? And would not such triumphal progress harmonize well with that Psalm, which has always been referred to in a special manner to the Ascension, and which speaks of the everlasting Gates as lifting up their heads, that the King of Glory might come in?

"Many other reflections occur to me, but I forbear. If anything unscriptural or unorthodox shall be detected by you in the foregoing remarks, or (in the event of your publishing them) by your readers the pointing it out will be received as an obligation by Sir, your obedient servant,

"W[illiam] R[owan] H[amilton]."

From the Nashville Christian Advocate.

BISHOP ANDREW ON PASTORAL FIDELITY.

"MR. EDITOR:—My mind has been greatly impressed of late with the importance to the Church, and especially to those whom the revivals of last year have gathered into the Church, of judicious and faithful pastoral visitation. It has pleased God to set his seal of approval upon our ministry, in a large portion of our work, by the awakening and conversion of thousands of precious souls, who have placed themselves under the care of our ministry and membership. They united with us because they felt their need of instruction, and looked to us to give it. They were, to a great extent, strangers to the way in which they were to walk, and they looked to the Church for faithful and godly counsel. They expected that fellowship with the Church would greatly help them in the way to heaven. Many of those persons have grown up without religious instruction; they know very little of Christian doctrine; they have been only awakened to a sense of their sinfulness, and it may be have found peace in believing; but the importance of growing in grace, of seeking after Christian perfection, is very imperfectly, if at all, understood by them. They will be assailed by doubt as to their conversion, and they are not sufficiently wise and strong to know how to dispose of these temptations. While surrounded by these, and a thousand other suggestions of their great enemy, how important that a scribe, well instructed in the things of God, should be at hand to counsel and sustain them in the good and the right way! It may be that many of them have been associated with the gay and the worldly, and they will be in great danger of falling back into those associations, and be gradually led away from communion with God and the Church. All this might be prevented by the watchful care and counsels of a faithful pastor.

There are many things in which an intelligent pastor's advice may be worth much to young Christians. Error in Christian doctrine floats on every breeze, and the young Christian may not be prepared to detect its presence. A venal press is flooding the country in all directions with a corrupt literature, which is finding its way into Christian families, and even into Sabbath-schools, thus sowing broadcast the seeds of error, which in coming time will yield an abundant harvest of evil. Much of this evil literature is sent forth into the world under the patronage of so-called Christian men, and have all the advantages of able writing as to style and matter; yea, many of these books are sent forth under the pretext of aiding the cause of Christ, while secretly they seek to destroy the power and truth of the Gospel.

Now, here is work for the Christian pastor. It is his business to keep a watchful eye upon the issues of the press, and see that his people have suitable reading furnished them, and that they be duly and faithfully warned against error in that direction. It will be found that where the pastor has been faithful and kind in his pastoral intercourse with his people, they will feel free to open their hearts to him under the various forms of trial and temptation to which they are exposed; but when the people are cursed with a pastor who feels that his only business is to preach a fine sermon on Sabbath, and during the week spend his time in visiting a few select families—perhaps occupying an hour or two in playing at chess and smoking tobacco, talking politics, or listening to the neighborhood gossip—no talk of Christ, and no word of prayer before leaving—in such cases the people are cursed indeed, and these flocks are left to wander into any pastures whose gates are open to them. Such pastures abound everywhere.

Some who have joined our Church have no peace in believing. They remain for years without any enjoyment of religion—after many years Church communion they have not yet been able to cry, Abba, Father. Suppose such disciples assailed by some shrewd proselyter—suppose, for instance, some Baptist brother should come along, and sing to them of water; or some Protestant Episcopal friend, laymen or clergyman, or possibly a bishop, and talk of apostolic succession, and baptismal regeneration, and by way of application, talk of the intelligence of his Church, and should intimate that they are so intelligent to remain much longer in the Methodist Church, and that nearly all the Generals have been confirmed in his Church; and should wind up all by telling the young people that in his Church there is no check on indulgence on those amusements which sober and devote Christians regard as unfriendly to deep and thorough Christianity—in these cases, which are not rare, think you that none of your sheep would be seduced? I say that such cases are not rare; and is it not probable that many of these cases of apostasy from Methodism might have been prevented by the pains-taking care of a devoted and intelligent pastor?

JAMES O. ANDREW.

Rev. Geo. W. Melloy, a pioneer of Methodism in the West, is dead.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

NORTH ALA. CORRESPONDENCE.

DR. KEENER: Like the "Star of Empire, emigration, is still winding her way westward." My charge for the present, is on the main road of travel, from Va., and the Carolinas to the Western States, both by rail and private conveyance, and I have been very much surprised of late, to see so many trains of the white covered emigrant wagons, filled with large families from North and South Carolina, Eastern Georgia, and North Ala., going to Arkansas and Texas, to seek homes, when there is so much uncultivated, good land in this country, for sale or rent, at cheaper rates than in those States, especially, when the expense of emigration is so great from the high prices of provisions for the families, and provender for the horses, mules and oxen. But while hundreds of white families are removing westward, the passenger and freight-trains are thronged with thousands of negroes, going to the Mississippi bottom, Arkansas and Texas, employed for the cultivation of cotton; several thousand have already passed going West, on the Memphis and Charleston Rail road. This portion of the country is considerably depleted already of the colored population, and there is no regret at the change of their "lease of operations." Many of the large land-owners, are leasing their acres to white laborers for cultivation, and the industrious poor, find it much better for them to cultivate, fertile, productive soil, and give one-third of the grain, and one-fourth of the cotton raised to the land-owner. Before the war, almost all the better land in this country, was cultivated by slave labor. Our poor white people, owned little unproductive farms, in the mountains or barren portions of the country. Many of whom worked hard, and scarcely raised enough for a scanty subsistence, for their families, which were often quite large. Now, all that are industrious, and are willing to work for their subsistence, can secure fertile fields to cultivate, or good stated wages for their labor. The gentleman with whom I make my home, has three white families of tenants, occupying the houses, and tilling the soil formerly occupied and cultivated by the negroes. One family, last year, with two laborers, raised six bales of cotton, and six or seven hundred bushels of corn. After giving the third and fourth for rent, their portion of the cotton and corn was worth at least $900 on the farm. And yet, owing to the severe draught of last summer, the yield was only about half a crop. I am glad to see some inclined to encourage white labor, while others complain of many white tenants, being trifling; they ought to remember, that nearly all the black laborers are trifling and unreliable, and we can never hope them to make good citizens.

Should universal suffrage be forced upon us, we may mitigate its evils to an extent, by encouraging our poorer classes of white citizens, to remain with us; and remove from the poorer countries, where the soil is unproductive to the communities, when good land is abundant, and the negroes will seek homes elsewhere, I think it will be much better for our churches also. The first and last instruction I ever gave as a public teacher, was to the colored people. I have ever felt a lively interest in their spiritual welfare, but I have less hope of accomplishing much for their permanent welfare, now than ever before. Last year, I had a Missionary from Ohio, to take possession of our Church in Huntsville, built for the colored people, and there was much contention among the colored people in consequence of his conduct. This year, I find that the territory I occupy, is missionary territory, indeed, neither the white nor black had been furnished a regular pastor, since the late war, the latter had not been preached to at all, only as they had attended services for the white people, and occupied seats furnished for their benefit years ago. Knowing their preference for preaching, for their own special benefit, I had a meeting of the stewards, after my first sermon, and proposed that we have a service every Sabbath evening, for the colored people. All agreed to the proposition, and since then, we have preaching as often for the black as for the white congregation. And yet, but few of them attend church, or take any interest in religious worship.

But it is my purpose to continue preaching for them, and try to, organize them into societies, and form Sabbath-schools for their benefit.

Last year a number of Northern men leased large plantations in this valley, and employed a large number of freedmen, to cultivate cotton, calculating to make a fortune, perhaps in a short time. None of whom have realized what they guessed—they would make. I know of but one in this vicinity, who will re-attempt the experiment this year. Most of them sank a large amount of money. Some scarce realizing enough to pay the rent of their lands, and many of the poor darkies were left without their promised pay. Some of them left before gathering their crops, and others between the sitting and rising of the sun. The deluded darkies in due time, will learn by experience who are their truest friends. Some of our citizens regret that the capitalists, so called, made such a complete failure in the experiment of cotton raising. I believe it is for our real good that they have failed, become disgusted, and quit the country. Their object in coming here, was to make money, not to identify themselves with us, indeed, and in truth. They did not understand the culture of cotton, or could not get the amount of labor out of the freedmen, or providence, did not favor them, in their schemes and speculations. They have been disappointed, and doubtless will return, or write home to their friends, and discourage them from coming South, to make a fortune in a single year. And it may be, that the Missionaries sent in advance to anticipate the great tide of Northern emigration to the South, which one of them, assured me, would soon flood our land, when they find that it is only a neap tide, they may float back with the ebb of the tide, and cease to trouble the weaker members of our church, either white or colored. I have been annoyed by two of those missionaries, but I have not seen a single white man, woman or child, who has left our church for the Mother Church, so called, by some of the ignorant colored members. God is blessing our church abundantly in North Alabama.

MONTGOMERY CONFERENCE.

REV. DR. J. C. KEENER: We are without the light of your excellent paper here. Bro. Blue has written for it to be sent to him here, but it has not come. I ought to have written, for I miss it much. Please send both to Tuskegee, Ala.

The preachers hereabout, have begun their work with an earnestness that betokens a year of success. Society is all astir. Freedmen moving, vast crowds going with planters, from Georgia and South Carolina, to Louisiana and Texas. Many farmers here have found it difficult to get all the laborers they wanted. Old debts contracted before the war, are pressing heavily upon many. The people are "studying to do their own business," and not concerning themselves, about the affairs of government. The Gentile questions, "What shall we eat, etc," absorb the attention of all.

In these times of trouble, the preachers are doing their appropriate work, comforting the people, and exhorting them to "be careful for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving to make their request unto God."

Many are moving to Texas, seeking a better country. Some of the best members of the (Tuskegee)

circuit have gone. But the Lord is still with us. Never saw such meetings in mid-winter, as some we have had. Called the Local Preachers together lately at Union Church, to carry out the requirement of the Discipline. Found them ready, and willing to work. The Lord manifested His presence. "Good to be there," said every one. We will have a meeting of all the Local Preachers in the circuit, on the 3rd Sabbath in February, at Warrior Stand, at the time of our first Quarterly Meeting. We have fourteen Local Preachers, and can supply every church with Sabbath preaching.

During the closing months of last year, I read the Third Volume of Stevens' History of Methodism. Verily, we are dwarfs in these days. O, for the fire, and earnestness, and zeal, that pulled down the strongholds of Satan, and built up the Church of God in the days of our fathers. "Mighty through God," says the apostle. We essay to do great things in our own strength.

We strive by muscle, and paws, and imposing forms to attract people to our churches, and get them into our fold; but forget that "our sufficiency is of God."

Forms, and church music have their place, and should not be ignored, but power we want, power from on high. May God give it to us. We are impatient, because the great and mighty do not cast in their lot with us, forgetting that "not many mighty, not many noble are called." Methodism was prosperous when it looked after such as the Colliers of Kingswood. It will be shorn of its strength, when it ceases to preach the gospel to the poor.

CONFERENCE REPORTS.

We insert the following extracts from the Reports of the Mississippi Conference.

Mississippi Conference.

REPORT ON MISSIONS.

The Committee on Missions have had under consideration the Foreign and Domestic Missions and submit the following report.

Four years, of terrible war separated us from our Foreign Missions, preventing our communication with them, and contributions to them to a very great extent. Since the restoration of peace, our land has been so impoverished that the people have not felt able more than to support the gospel at home, and in many places they have not been able to do that, so that in some circuits, ministers have been compelled to follow the plow during the week in order that they might fill the pulpit on Sabbath, thus imitating Paul the tentmaker. Yet notwithstanding these formidable difficulties, something has been accomplished in the Foreign Mission fields. Some of our missionaries heroically remained at their post of duty, though for four long years cut off from communication with our church at home.

Our own noble and beloved brother, J. W. Lambuth, through many difficulties, fired by an unquenchable, missionary zeal, returned to China in 1863; since which time he has been laboring, not without success and encouragement; part of the time supporting himself and heroic wife, by the labor of his own hands.

Who can think of these devoted self-sacrificing brethren and their noble wives, without feeling a thrill of admiration for them, and breathing the earnest prayer that their number may be multiplied. A letter has been recently received from Bro Lambuth, asking that in view of the failure of his health, in consequence of the climate of Shanghai, that he be transferred to California, to labor among the Chinese there. He believes there is an effective door among that people, and missionary effort made there will react on their native land, and notwithstanding other failures in that field, and the opposition to such a step, made in high places, your committee, with all the lights before them, recommend the transfer of Rev. J. W. Lambuth to the California Mission.

There are many other fields of Missionary labor white to the harvest, to which we would like to direct your attention and effort at this time, but from which we are restrained by the anomalous and peculiar condition of finances of this section of country. But while we cannot at once accomplish all a broad Christian philanthropy would dictate and desire, we do most earnestly recommend upon all our ministerial brethren to keep the Foreign Missions prominently and constantly before the minds of our people, and by all suitable means cherish missionary zeal until these calamities be over past.

REPORT ON PERIODICALS.

Fourth.—The N. O. Christian Advocate. This is one of our own papers published in our immediate vicinity, is the recognized organ of this Conference, is well known to all of us, and ought to have a far wider circulation that it has received. We hope to see the paper enlarged, and that it may continue to maintain its conservative religious and literary character.

REPORT ON FINANCES.

We the undersigned Committee appointed by your body would beg leave to make the following report: The collections upon the Districts for Missions, superannuated preachers, and orphans, are below the receipts of last year; and far below the pressing demands of the poor and dependent who look to us for bread.

The amount collected for the "Bishops' fund," is only $639, and the claim about $1400, one half our apportionment. The claims of those who have worn themselves out, and of the widows and orphans of those dying in the service of the church, though small and meagre the claim is $5000. Of that, only one third can be paid from the funds placed in our hands. How are our widows and orphans to be supported? The poor of the Conference, to whom are they to look? To the future world, while in this they starve! How can our people excuse themselves from a cheerful and liberal response, to the highest appeals of benevolence and charity; the one most prominently set forth in the Bible—the cause of the widow and orphan. They are poor, they are widows and orphans from service, sacrifice and toil in the noblest cause; they are poor, and are poorly fed.

We find from reports to the Conference, that the assessment for ministerial support is diminished, and only one third collected. The financial condition of our fields of labor are discouraging, and a great injury to the full and untrammelled cause of the gospel will result. The ministry must be supported, either by the church or by a partial devotion of time to secular labor.

The church is able and willing, if instructed, to support the ministry. To increase our receipts and pay our poor, we would respectfully recommend the following Resolutions:

Resolution 1. That the Presiding Elders take up a collection for those dependent upon us, and the "Bishops' fund," at every Quarterly meeting held on their several districts.

Resolution 2. That a sermon on giving be preached at every appointment by the pastor.

Resolution 3. That from every Board of Stewards, one be appointed as General Superintendent of finances.

Reports from the Alabama Conference.

REPORT OF THE LEGAL CONFERENCE.

The Legal Conference beg leave to report to the Annual Conference briefly, the management and condition of the interests in our hands. We are sorry to be obliged to state, that like the personal affairs of nearly all of us, the interests of the Conference have suffered sadly by the convulsions that have come upon the country.

The fall of the Confederacy found us with some $7,000 in Confederate securities in hand. Most of this we had on hand because we could make no safe disposition of it in the way of investment. It was paid to us in Confederate money and bonds, under such circumstances that we could not refuse it. For instance, the $1,000 left to the Conference by our deceased Brother Hood, was paid over to us at the Tuskegee Conference, in November, 1864, when the value of Confederate securities had become so reduced and uncertain that nobody was willing to take them on loan. The sum was true of some $2,200 of the Mahan Legacy, paid to us by the Executor, Sept. 3, 1864, and of some $2,400 of the Jackson Legacy, paid over to us the same year, and of $1,000 from the estate of Brother Harris, of East Alabama, that was paid to us in Nov., 1864. All these sums, as the Conference will observe, were legacies, and paid over by executors or representatives of estates, and we had no option as to their reception; and paid to us at so late a date in the history of the Confederacy, that the general distrust and uncertainty of the public precluded the possibility of desirable investments or loans. In this state of things we consulted some of our judicious laymen, and they, as blind as ourselves as to the future, advised that we put all our money into bonds, and hold them, as by this date all kinds of property had risen to such enormous prices, and every thing for the future was felt to be so unsettled that no investments were desirable.

After a tedious lawsuit, we have recently obtained a judgment for some $2,800 in Kemper county, in this State. But in view of the laws of Mississippi, and the circumstances of the defendants, we have found ourselves obliged, since we came here, to compromise for $1,000. The McAlister Estate is still in law; owing to the persistent opposition of various contestants, and the suspension of the courts, we have not been able, up to this time, to get a final hearing; but the case is now set for the third Monday in next month, when we hope to reach the beginning of the end.

We will add that the Montgomery Conference has received its share of all our funds. It received it in Confederate funds, of the same date and value with our own, and of course they have sustained the same loss.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. HAMILTON, CHAIRMAN.

REPORT ON EDUCATION.

The Committee on Education beg leave to report that there are under the patronage of the Conference at this time, three institutions of learning, viz:

1. The Southern University, located at Greensboro, Ala. The Trustees congratulate themselves and the Conference, on having secured the services of Bishop Wightman as Chancellor, during the present Session. The Faculty remains the same as last year, and all the schools of the University are in successful operation, with 72 students.

2. The Centenary Institute, located at Sumnerfield, Ala. The Trustees report that they have secured the services of Rev. R. K. Hargrove, A. M., as Principal of the Female Department for the present Session, and your Committee would unite with them in expressing their highest gratification in the arrangement. He is assisted by a thoroughly competent Faculty. The Trustees are firm in sustaining the Principal in his endeavors to render the institution worthy of the confidence of the Church. There are fifty pupils at present under his charge. The Boarding Department is in the hands of Mr. Jno. J. Heard and Lady, well and favorably known to many of this Conference. The Buildings are now being thoroughly repaired, which, when completed, will add much in the appearance and comfort of the Institution. The Primary Department is under the management of Mrs. Rice, well known as a Christian lady and successful teacher. This school numbers 30 pupils. The Male Department is under the superintendence of Messrs. John Massey, A. M., and Wm. G. Hill, who are assisted by competent teachers. These gentlemen are most favorably known to many of the members of this body, as eminently qualified for that position. In view of the fact that the Centenary Institute is jointly held by the Mobile and Montgomery Conferences, your Committee would offer the following, viz:

Resolved, That the Board of Trustees of Centenary Institute be reorganized immediately, so that the Mobile and Montgomery Conferences may be equally represented therein, and the Secretary be instructed to inform the Montgomery Conference of our action in the premises without delay.

3. Tuskegee Female College, located at Tuskegee, Ala. The Trustees report that this institution has entered upon the present session with encouraging prospects. It commands all the local patronage of our denomination. It is popular at home, which is considered a cheering sign, and it confidently appeals to its friends abroad, in and out of the Conference, to assist in elevating it to that position of extended usefulness, to which the signal facilities for instruction justly entitle it. It is under the management of Professor W. C. Richardson and Lady, assisted by a corps of experienced and accomplished instructors. The Boarding Department is entrusted to Judge Orrin Davis and Lady. The Committee ask that the Trustees recently elected by the Board, may be confirmed by the Conference.

In behalf of all our educational interests, your Committee would urge most earnestly upon the members of this body, the necessity for renewed effort, that these institutions of the Church may accomplish the high and sacred purposes for which they were established.

We insert the following from the Nashville Christian Advocate, as suggestive to Presiding Elders, of the way in which the District Meeting can be made a valuable addition to our Church Machinery:

Kentucky Conference.

DISTRICT MEETING FOR THE SHELBYVILLE DISTRICT.

The itinerant and local ministers, and the membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, within the Shelbyville District, Kentucky Annual Conference, are respectfully invited to hold a district meeting at Lagrange, on Tuesday and Wednesday, the 26th and 27th of February, 1867. The opening sermon at 10 o'clock, on Tuesday, will be delivered by the Rev. H. A. C. Walker.

D. WELCH, Presiding Elder.

Business which it is expected will claim the attention of the Shelbyville District Meeting at Lagrange, on the 26th and 27th of February, 1867.

1. An apportionment among the different classes of the amounts which the Kentucky Annual Conference has asked from the district for the support of the Bishops, Conference Collection, Domestic Missions, and Foreign Missions.
2. Receive reports of moneys and produce collected for the benefit of our suffering Southern brethren.
3. The adoption of a plan by which the preachers of this and of neighboring districts shall co-operate with each other in labors for the salvation of souls.
4. To make such an arrangement of the churches and neighborhoods of this district, into stations and circuits, as shall, if adopted by the proper authorities at the Conference, make the charges self-sustaining, and their forms permanent.
5. To make such arrangements for occupying the territory of the district, as to have no place in more than five miles from a Methodist Church.
6. To consider the expediency of uniting contiguous weak churches at some central point, so as to secure large Sunday congregations.
7. To consider the practicability of removing to points on much frequented public roads those church-buildings which have been fenced out from public highways.
8. To consider the advantages resulting to strong churches, if occasional meetings should be held on the outskirts of the neighborhoods which furnish their congregations.
9. To arrange for holding numerous camp and basket-meetings in the district, between the first of May and the first of September.
10. To consider the expediency of requesting our Bishops to hold the Kentucky Annual Conference in March, instead of September or October of each year.
11. To consider the propriety of asking the General Conference to include the entire State of Kentucky in one, two, or three Annual Conferences.
13. To ask what can be done that we are not now doing to save souls and strengthen the Church.

Let us take a man in the prime of life, say at six or seven and thirty, cut off and summoned into the presence of Christ. What opportunities, what time, think you, has that man had for learning his duty to his Maker? Without counting infancy and early childhood, he has had four good years of Sundays—four years, during which it ought to have been his special business to listen to God's Word read and preached; to pray to God in the great congregation, and then, in the quiet of his home, to think over what he has heard, what he has asked for, what he has promised. So plentifully has God provided for the nurture of our souls in godliness, he hath set apart ten years out of the age of man, during which we are commanded to abstain from every other work, that we may give ourselves wholly to the most important of all works, that of learning the way to heaven.—Rev. A. W. Hare.

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.—A Presbyterian minister of Cincinnati says that every family of his flock takes their church paper: "We find that there is neither health nor progress where a religious newspaper is not taken; hence one of our rules is, to see that every family, however poor, is supplied."

CHURCH PROPERTY.—It is reported that the Montgomery county court, (Md.) at its recent session granted to the authorities of the Methodist Episcopal Church an injunction, prohibiting the further occupancy of their churches in that county by Southern Methodists.

TRICKS OF PROVERBS.—A small stone often makes a great noise. A foolish friend is at times a greater annoyance than a wise enemy. You'll not sweeten your mouth by saying "honey." If a man would live in peace he should be blind, deaf, and dumb. Do good and throw it into the sea; if the fish know it not, the Lord will! Who fears God need not fear man. If thy foe be as small as a gnat, fancy him as large as an elephant. A man who weeps for every one will soon have lost his eyesight. More is learned from conversation than from books. A friend is of more worth than a kinsman. He rides seldom who never rides any but a borrowed horse. Trust to the whiteness of his turban who bought the soap on credit. Death is a black camel, that kneels before every man's door.

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.—A Presbyterian minister of Cincinnati says that every family of his flock takes their church paper: "We find that there is neither health nor progress where a religious newspaper is not taken; hence one of our rules is, to see that every family, however poor, is supplied."

BRITISH HONDURAS.

Mr. Emton: The opinions of all those whose schooling was had some 30 or 35 years since, derived from the same common source, (the geographies of that date) are no doubt similar, concerning the general characteristics of all those countries in Central America, bordering up on the Caribbean Sea.

The sea was said to derive its name from the Caribs; a ferocious people of cannibalistic propensities, who occupied and held those countries, which, while prolific in superlative abundance of tropical products and wealth, were fit only as an abode for such savages, venomous insects and reptiles, wild ferocious animals, monkeys, etc., etc., and that civilized man could not exist, in consequence of the heat, and those virulent and noxious diseases, (chagres, and yellow fever,) which originated and prevailed there, making life insupportable, and existence a burden to any of the Caucasian race, whose temerity carried them into the fatal precincts of the country. Those opinions of the mass of men were confirmed by the occasional newspaper accounts, of the sufferings and privations of adventurers, and more particularly, and recently, of "Walker and his men." Certainly such were the impressions left upon my mind.

Never having given the subject either reflection or impartial investigation, and accepted as established truths, the "printed statements," and but for the stern necessity, resulting from the fortunes of war, should have remained in blissful ignorance of the easy, independent, and comfortable mode in which I might have lived during the past thirty years, had I only known the truth. That such were the impressions of many others, I feel assured by the questions propounded.

"Is not the country overrun with all kinds of snakes and venomous insects? Do not mosquitoes make life intolerable? Are there not immense numbers of wild and ferocious animals, and alligators? Are not the people savages and inimical to whites, is it safe to venture among them? Is not the heat perfectly insupportable? Does not the chagres and yellow fever originate there, and rage violently all the year?"

These, and many others, too numerous to repeat, indicate very plainly the prevailing errors, respecting that country. In my rambles through it during four months, I have not seen half a dozen snakes, but one alligator, no savage or ferocious animal, and did not suffer as much from mosquitoes, as during one week of the winter months in New Orleans; neither the chagres or yellow fever originate there, and very rarely prevail as epidemics.

No doubt there are many snakes, (as St. Patrick did not extend his visit to that country,) and such other pests, but I was fortunate in not seeing or suffering from them.

As somewhat explanatory of the reason why such errors have been perpetuated, I beg to refer you and your readers, to the following article as preferable to anything I could say, emanating as it does, from one who having been a resident of Belize, for many long years, can speak understandingly.

Yours Respectfully,
JAMES M. PUTNAM.

COPIED FROM THE COLONIST OF JUNE 3, 1865.

"Of all the causes which render a habitation in British Honduras, a terror to emigrants, we know of none more potent than the supposed insalubrity of the climate, and the reputation it enjoys for the frequency and virulence of its epidemics. Who of us, when leaving a country where enterprise and business of all kinds are clogged and overcrowded, to seek a field in which our energies and labors will be rewarded, has not been advised to relinquish our projects, and our hopes of advancement in life, by the well-meant but ill-considered advice of our elderly friends, who, with tears in their eyes, in bidding us, 'good bye,' wish us all health and prosperity, at the same time hope we may not meet with an 'early grave?' There is no doubt that this forms a very serious bar to the benefit we expect to derive from the infusion of new blood among us, and the immigration of laborers from neighboring colonies; and we have already seen that the press, in some of the islands, is only too willing to procure a subject like this to exaggerate, so that they may deter their overcrowded and starving population from emigrating to a country where there is plenty of labor, and equivalent remuneration. This unfavorable impression, doubtless, originated from the fact, that unless for the mahogany with which it supplied the English market, and the reports of some drunken sailors who imprudently exposed themselves, comparatively little was known about the country, and that little became so distorted and exaggerated, that most persons thought of it only as a swampy hot-bed of fevers of the worst form. We think it our duty to the colony to point out a few of the most important facts connected with its climatology, so that those who are willing to trust their fortunes among us, and are able to turn the resources of the country to good account, may not be deterred from doing so, by a want of information on the subject.

The general supposition that the climate of British Honduras must be insalubrious, arose in a great measure, from the writings of persons who were not long enough here to judge for themselves, and, therefore, trusted to hearsay for their information; and of others—as the writer in "Colburn's Magazine," who, for the purpose of making the Home Government think it a perfect nest for yellow fever, so that extra pay might be given for service here, vilified the colony to such an extent, that one would have fancied this place worse than the West coast of Africa. This writer makes two officers, who died on the passage from Jamaica to Sierra Leone, the victims of yellow fever in Belize, and gives the disease the credit of killing a few others, who, in reality, died from the inordinate use of alcoholic liquors.

Being situated within the tropics, we must naturally expect to find the heat considerable; but on comparing it with some of the other West Indian Colonies, we have great reason to congratulate ourselves in having a climate most equable and temperate.

The following figures will show that there is comparatively little variation in the temperature of the hottest and coldest months of the year, and that the heat is not much greater than we find in many parts of England, in summer, while it is very much less than is experienced in Canada:

Thermometer.	Max.	Min.
January.....	76.82	73.46
February.....	79.54	76.23
March.....	80.68	78.30
April.....	80.88	77.93
May.....	83.31	80.46
June.....	84.68	82.46
July.....	83.77	81.62
August.....	84.83	81.49
September.....	84.72	81.46
October.....	82.14	77.66
November.....	78.25	72.75
December.....	77.60	74.28

According to these observations, which extend over a whole twelvemonth, we find but very little variation of temperature; therefore, we have less to guard against in the way of chills, and fewer precautions to adopt in regard to clothing; moreover, we have constant sea breezes, except towards the end of the year, which greatly modify the influence of the sun's rays, and lessen the danger from coup de soleil.

The prevailing winds are from the east and north-east, except for a short time, about the end of the year, when we have westerly and north-westerly winds, which coming across the land, generally bring a little sickness along with them, but their continuance is of such short duration, that with a little extra care of ourselves, they might be rendered as innocuous as the other winds.

With the exception of from February to May, rain falls in considerable quantities throughout the year; and these exceptions form what is termed the "dry season," a period generally free from sickness, and very pleasant in consequence of the strong and constant breeze blowing from the sea.

The reputation which this place has held for its insalubrity, and the injurious influence of its climate on strangers is not carried out by any statistical statements; indeed, strangers generally enjoy an immunity from the usual sicknesses which attack the native population. The duration of life here is something extraordinary; and if this is considered a proof of the salubrity of a country, then we may claim this to be one of the healthiest places under the sun. We heard a day or two ago, of an old woman, a pensioner of the colony, having arrived at the extraordinary age of 105 years, and we know of several octogenarians and nonagenarians, who are in the enjoyment of comparative health and vigor, considering their venerable age.

Epidemics rarely make their appearance here, and when they come among us, are generally mild in their character, and do not decimate the population, as we have seen them do in other colonies. Cholera, visited us some time ago, and proved a very serious calamity to the community; but at that time, the town of Belize was so crowded, and the houses so ill-ventilated and dirty, that we need not have felt astonished at the ravages it made. The successions of fire, did good in clearing away many of these nuisances. Small pox broke out in 1856, and left its undeniable marks on those who had not been vaccinated; but now that provision has been made for compulsory vaccination, if properly carried out, we need not fear its return. In 1860 yellow fever evidenced itself in an epidemic form, but of a very mild character; in fact it is said, that it more resembled a pernicious form of remittent fever, than the real remittent fever, and many cases were recorded, which were simply imaginary.

The prevailing diseases are those, which from the nature of the climate and country, we are most likely to expect,—namely, fevers of a malarious origin, with occasional cases, biliousness and rheumatism. Remittent fever is by far the most common of all the ailments of this place, and is not so much the effect of miasmatic exhalations, as the want of attention to general sanitary principles necessary to promote health, the undue exposure to the influence of the sun, irregularities of living, and the inordinate use of that poisonous spirit, new rum. We have no doubt that this is the predisposing cause of all our severe bilious fevers; and when we see the immunity enjoyed from these attacks, by persons of abstemious habits, every one must be convinced that it is so. From the appearance of the surrounding country, one would suppose that intermittent fever would be a common affection, but it is not so; for rarely do we see a true and characteristic case of "fever and ague." We have long been convinced that there would be few cases of any of those fevers, were the inhabitants to become more temperate, and devote what is spent for the injury of their constitutions, to bettering the condition of their households. If they do so, then we may safely assert that our mortality statistics will bear comparison with those of the healthiest towns in England or Scotland. It is impossible to do justice to this subject in one article, therefore, we intend resuming it at some early date; but in the meantime, we would recommend those who have been willing to try their fortunes here, and who have been deterred by want of information in regard to the salubrity of the climate, to come at once, and we assure them that with ordinary care, they will enjoy as good health here, as they would in almost any town in Europe or America."

ARTIC EXPLORATIONS.

BIRD-CATCHING IN GREENLAND.

While I was watching these movements with much interest, my companion was intent only upon business, and warned me to lie lower, as the birds saw me and were flying too high overhead. Having at length got myself stowed away to the satisfaction of my savage companion, the sport began. The birds were beginning again to whirl their flight closer to our heads—so close, indeed, did they come that it seemed almost as if I could catch them with my cap. Presently I observed my companion preparing himself, as a flock of unusual thickness was approaching; and, in a moment, up went the net; and a half dozen birds flew bang into it, and, stunned with the blow, they could not flutter out before Kalutnah had slipped the staff quickly through his hands and seized the net; with his left hand he now pressed down the birds, while with the right he drew them out, one by one, and for want of a third hand, he used his teeth to crush their heads. The wings were then locked across each other, to keep them from fluttering away, and with an air of triumph the old fellow looked around at me, spat the blood and feathers from his mouth, and went on with the sport, and tossing up his net and hauling it in with much rapidity until he had caught about a hundred birds; when, my curiosity being amply satisfied, we returned to the camp and made a hearty meal out of the game which we had bagged in this novel and unsportsmanlike manner. While an immense stew was preparing, Kalutnah amused himself with tearing off the bird's skins and consuming the raw flesh while it was yet warm.

BRILLIANCY OF THE ARCTIC SUMMER.

The sun reaching its greatest northern declination on the 21st, we were now in the full blaze of summer. Six eventful months had passed over since the Arctic midnight had shrouded us in gloom, and now we had reached the Arctic mid-day. And this mid-day was a day of wonderful brightness. The temperature had gone up higher than at any previous time, marking, at meridian, forty-nine degrees, while in the sun the thermometer showed fifty-seven degrees. A more calm and lovely air never softened an Arctic landscape.

Tempted by the day, I strolled down into the valley south of the harbor. The recent snow had mostly disappeared, and valley and hill-side were speckled with a rich carpet of green, with only here and there a patch of the winter snow yet undissolved—an emerald carpet, fringed and inlaid with silver, and sprinkled over with fragments of a bouquet—for many flowers were now in full bloom, and their tiny faces peeped above the sod. A herd of reindeer were browsing on the plain beneath me, and some white rabbits had come from their hiding places to feed upon the bursting willow buds. New objects of interest led me on from spot to spot—babbling brooks, and rocky hill-sides, and little glaciers, and softening snow banks, alternating with patches of tender green.

A marvelous change had come over the face of nature since the shadow of the night had passed away. Recalling the gloom and silence of the arctic night—the death-like quiet which reigned in the endless darkness—the absence of every living thing—that could relieve the solitude of its terrors—it was not possible to see, without surprise, the same landscape covered with an endless blaze of light, the air and sea and earth teeming with life; the desert places sparkling with green, and brightening with flowers—the mind finding everywhere some new object of pleasure, were before there was but gloom. The change of the Arctic Winter to the Arctic Summer, is indeed the change from death to life; and the voice which speaks to the sun and the winds, and brings back the joyous day, is that same voice which said:

"She is not dead, but sleepeth," and the pulseless heart was made to throb again, and the blossom returned to the pallid cheek.

Mr. Charles Sumner has delivered a ferocious philippic against the President; he says, in winding up, "The country sees the President of the rebellion revived in the President of the United States, who promising to be a Moses has become a Pharaoh."

Jaurez is improving his condition in Mexico. He was escorted into the city of Durango by six thousand people; there are eighteen Americans on his staff.

FARM AND GARDEN.

Scientific Farming.

The whole business and purpose of farming may be embraced in two maxims, as follows:

- 1st. To raise the largest possible crops with the least possible labor.
- 2d. To maintain the fertility of the soil with the least possible exhaustion.

The first of these maxims has commanded general attention throughout the United States, and a rage for large crops at whatever expense of future fertility, have become almost a mania in many parts of the country. The present system of giving prizes at our Agricultural Fairs, if it does not tend directly to produce this state of indifference to the future productiveness of our fields, certainly does nothing to counteract it.

Who ever heard of a society offering a premium for the best series of crops on the same field for five or ten years? To maintain the fertility of the soil is not only one of the principle interests of the farmer, but it is a duty he owes to those who are to succeed him in his business. Fortunately the two maxims above stated in no way conflict with each other.

The largest possible crop may be produced this year without materially impairing the capacity of the soil, and repeat the same next year, and each succeeding year indefinitely.

A good soil can be worn out only by criminal neglect and carelessness in its cultivation. In England, fields that have been cultivated a thousand years, are now producing forty bushels of wheat to the acre, and each year marks a slow but certain increase in the crop. The average per acre of crops in the agricultural counties of England has advanced twenty per cent. since the beginning of this century. The same is true of Sweden, and of portions of France, Germany and Belgium. This is to be attributed mainly to the application of scientific principles, pointed out by Sir Humphrey Davy in England, Scheele in Sweden, Bousingault in France, and Liebig in Germany. While this is true in the old world, how have we fared in this country? If we take the census of 1840, and compare it with that of 1860, we shall discover while the aggregate production has greatly increased, the average per acre has been constantly diminishing. Between 1840 and 1850 this was true of all the States in all the principle crops cultivated; but between 1850 and 1860 several of the States nearly maintained their average, while one of them, Massachusetts, and several counties in others, show a small advance.—Prof. R. T. BROWN.—Northwestern Farmer.

Dressing Poultry for Market.

The following hints on poultry-dressing are gathered from a circular lately issued by Morrison, Taylor & Co., of this city. The instructions are so thoroughly practical, that we believe we will be consulting the interests of such of our readers as are in the habit of marketing fowls, by giving them a place in our columns.

"We would here remark that 'scrawling' poultry always sells low in this market, and that between a well dressed fowl and a poorly dressed one, the difference in price will make a fair profit, 1st. Food in the coop injures the appearance and sale, therefore, keep from food twenty-four hours before killing. 2d. Opening the veins in the neck is the best mode of killing.

If the head be taken off at first, the skin will recede from the neck bone, presenting a repulsive spectacle. 3d. Most of the poultry in this market is "scalded" or "wet picked," "dry picked" is preferred by a few, and sells to a limited extent only, at full prices. Poultry may be picked dry, without difficulty, if done without delay after killing. The bird, held by the legs, should be immersed, and lifted up and down in the water three times. Continue to hold the bird by the legs with one hand, while plucking the feathers with the other, without a moment's delay after taking out. If skillfully handled in this way, the feathers and pin-feathers may all be removed without breaking the skin. A torn or broken skin greatly injures the appearance. 4th. The intestines should not be "drawn."

After removing the feathers, the head may be taken off, and the skin drawn over the neck bone and tied. This is the best method, though much comes to the market with the head on. 5th. It should next be "plunged" by being dipped about two seconds into water, nearly, or quite, boiling, hot, and then at once into cold water the same length of time. It should be entirely cold, but not frozen, before being packed. 6th. In packing, use clean hand-trashed rye straw. If this cannot be had, wheat or oat straw will answer, but be sure that it is clean and free from dust. Place a layer of straw at the bottom, then alternate layers of poultry and straw, taking care to stow snugly, back upwards, legs under the body, filling vacancies with straw, and filling the package so that the cover will drive down very closely upon the contents, to prevent shifting on the way. Boxes are the best packages, and should contain from, say, 150 to 200 lbs.—Canada Farmer.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

How to Cook a BEEFSTEAK.—A beefsteak, ought always to be broiled and never fried; but the following method of cooking is recommended by Mrs. Hutton, which even those who are accustomed to frying may be willing to try: "The frying-pan being wiped very dry, place it upon the stove, and let it become hot, very hot. In the mean time, mangle the steak—if it chance to be surloin, so much the better—pepper and salt it; then lay it in the hot dry pan, which instantly covers as tight as possible. When the raw flesh touches the heated pan, of course it seethes and adheres to it, but in a few seconds it becomes loosened, and juicy. Every half minute turn the steak; but be careful to keep it as much as possible under cover. When nearly done lay a small piece of butter upon it, and if you want gravy, add a tablespoonful of strong good coffee. In three minutes from the time the steak first goes into the pan it is ready for the table. This method of cooking makes the most delicious, delicately broiled steak, full of juice, yet retaining the healthy beefy flavor that any John Bull could require. The same method may be applied to mutton chops, only they require a little longer cooking to prevent them from being rare. An excellent gravy may be made for them by adding a little cream, thickened with a pinch of flour, into which when off the fire and partly cool, stir in the yolk of an egg, well beaten.

STEWED BEEF'S KIDNEY.—Clean the kidney of all the fat, cut in two, and with a sharp knife cut out the fibre which runs through the middle of it. Lay it in a saucepan with a very little water and a little salt, cover it close and let it stew till it is perfectly tender, then take it up and cut it in small pieces, season it with pepper and more salt if requisite, and return it to the stew pan; let it stew till there are about two spoonfuls of gravy remaining in the stew pan, then add a piece of butter and a little flour. Let it boil once and serve it.

FRIED BEEF'S KIDNEY.—Clean all the fat off the kidney, cut it open and take out the fibre which runs through it; put it in a stew pan with a very little water and some salt, and cook it till it is tender; then season it with pepper and more salt if required, flour it and fry it in hot lard, add a little flour and water to make the gravy. Or you may broil instead of frying it, after it has been parboiled.

FRENCH STEW OF VEAL.—Boil knuckle of veal in just enough water to cover it, with a little salt. When the veal is tender pour off the water it was boiled in and save it. Cut the veal in small pieces and put it in a pan with the water it was boiled in. Add to this two hard boiled eggs, chopped very fine, a table spoonful of allspice in grains, (which should be crushed but not broken fine,) a quarter of a pound of butter, a little mace and pepper, and salt to taste. Stir two table spoonfuls off, flour smoothly in a little water, and pour into it. Set it over the fire, let it boil for two or three minutes, pour in two glasses of wine, and serve it hot.

COMMON FAMILY APPLE SACK.—Let your stock of apples be picked over several times in the course of the Winter, and all the defective ones taken out. Let the good parts of those be pared and if not used for pies, be made into apple sauce. Boil it in a preserving kettle, and to a paulful of cut apples put one sliced lemon. After the apples are tender add a pint bowl of brown sugar and boil them gently fifteen minutes longer. Toward Spring, when apples become tasteless, a teaspoonful of tartaric acid, dissolved in a little water, should be added to this quantity of apple.

STUFFING FOR A TURKEY OR CHICKEN.—Take some bread crumbs and turn on just enough hot water to soften them; put in a piece of butter, not melted, the size of a hen's egg, a spoonful of pulverized sage, a teaspoonful of ground pepper, and a teaspoonful of salt; there may be some of the bread crumbs that need to be chopped; then mix thoroughly, and stuff your turkey.

VEAL CUTLETS.—Cut the veal in thin slices, pound and wash it, then dry it in a clean cloth. Beat some egg, and have ready some bread crumbs, or grated cracker. Season the meat with salt, pepper and a little mace, dip each slice in the crumbs, and fry them in hot lard. They should be brown on both sides.

SATURDAY FEBRUARY 2d 1867.

THE ASSISTANT PASTOR.

As that most excellent usage of appointing two preachers to one circuit, a Preacher in Charge, and an Assistant Preacher, has well nigh gone out of vogue, we propose to revive it at a cheap rate—cheapness being really its only objectionable feature. We suggest that a Christian Advocate is a most faithful pastor, visiting, encouraging, entertaining, comforting, and enlightening the people of God. Will the Preacher in Charge accept of so quiet, well behaved, and reasonable an Assistant? All that is necessary, is a little pains to introduce the "Helper."

To Advertisers.

This paper has for many years been well known in this community as the very best advertising medium by which the business men of the city could bring their merchandise, trades, professions, and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood when it is remembered that the four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States in the Rio Grand, East Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all, more or less active agents for the paper; and when it is also remembered that our paper circulates among a large class of people who seldom see any other New Orleans paper.

To Travelling Preachers.

If there are any of the members of the patronizing Conferences, Superannuates, Supernumeraries, or effective, who by oversight have not received their paper, they will please advise us thereof stating their Post Office Conference and Circuit. And keep writing until the paper comes.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order; or at least of the large towns, post office receipts can be purchased.

CONFERENCE JOURNALS.

We have received the Minutes of the Louisiana, the Montgomery, and the North Carolina Conferences; also those of the Louisiana African M. E. Church. In point of paper, typography, arrangement, and fulness, those of the North Carolina is decidedly superior. The Montgomery "Minutes" is an excellent printer's job, but the Louisiana is poor enough. Too much economy here is out of place. The Missionary collections of the Montgomery Conference were considerably in advance of the other two, netting $3,599 52. It raised $4,593 65 for Widows/Orphans, Superannuates, etc. but we see no report of the amount raised for the Bishops. The North Carolina Conference raised for Missions, $1,221 18, for Widows, etc., $1,432 10, and for Bishops, $1,020 65. The Louisiana raised for Missions $1,871 05, for Widows and Orphans, $1,407 30, and for the Bishops, $985 95. The North Carolina stations 102 effective preachers, the Montgomery 100, and the Louisiana 66.

In the Minutes of the latter Conference, there is a tabular statement of the amount of each preacher's Total Allowance and Total Receipts; a very satisfactory and important item in Conference statistics. It forms the basis for all financial calculations for the succeeding year; determines what per cent upon the whole is necessary to raise the Bishop's claim, and what to pay Widows and Orphans. So that the Conference, without any other machinery, can advertise each circuit and society, how much is expected of it toward raising these claims. And in case of deficiency in the sums raised; the defect can be ascertained exactly and to whom it is chargeable. There is a small item here which we transcribe from the Louisiana "Minutes, worth an octavo of "Resolves."

"The Conference, by resolution, requires the Preachers to pay this year Five per cent, on their total receipts, for the support of the Widows, Orphans and Superannuates. Failing to raise this amount by public collections, they are required to pay it themselves."

We notice another peculiarity in this Conference, that by the arrangement of Examining Committees, the Committee on English Literature examines "all four classes—the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th years—on the studies under that head. So the Committee on Biblical Literature examines the four classes. By this arrangement a candidate passes each year under the eye of all four committees: English Literature; Biblical Literature; Doctrinal and Controversial Theology; Ecclesiastical History and Church Government. He must satisfy eight men or a majority of them. It is sufficient that the Committees report, to the Conference, through a chairman, that they consider the examination of candidates "satisfactory." Discriminating statements as to the grade of the examination, is, we think, superfluous, to be able to pass, should sufficiently indicate good scholarship.

The Montgomery Conference, reports 225 Sabbath schools, and $848 scholars; an increase during the year of 59 schools, and 2,850 scholars, with a corresponding increase in teachers and Library books. The North Carolina shows 252 schools, and 10,336 scholars. While the Louisiana adds up only the meagre sum of 34 schools, and 1,926 scholars; one half of whom are in the New Orleans District. Among several good resolutions, we notice two by the Montgomery: "That the children be indoctrinated with the principles of Wesleyan Theology;" "That much pains-taking attention be given to singing; and that time books and a musical instrument be introduced whenever practicable."

All of the Conferences have been "exercised," ever since we can remember, upon the vital question of support. This question has of late assumed a life and death expression. The North Carolina has taken one step in advance of the usual money resolutions and plans characteristic of Methodism.

Resolved, 1st. That in the judgment of this Annual Conference, it is the clear, obvious and unquestioned Scriptural duty of all Christians to contribute of, and according to their means, to support the benevolent enterprises of the church, and to sustain the ministry which serves them.

Resolved, 3. That members of the church, who refuse or neglect to make reasonable contributions for these objects, (whether little or much,) according to the ability which God has given them, do by such neglect or refusal, plainly disregard the spirit, principles and precepts of the Gospel, as well as the general rules of our church. Hence, when in the judgment of a regular church meeting, any of the members thereof are justly and obviously chargeable with such neglect, the delinquent party should be dealt with in this as in other cases of "neglect of duty," according to the directions of the Discipline, on page 126.

It determines this in view of the great corresponding fact: "That no minister among us has the right to abandon the field of labor assigned him."

Those acts of worship, or philanthropy, which involve no loss of substance, and are accompanied by no visible offering will always be open to suspicion. An attempt to substitute offerings for repentance is offensive to God; and on the other hand, it must be equally so to bring to Him a pious frame of mind unaccompanied by any substantial deed of faith. Our people have separated St. James so far from St. Paul, that we sometimes fear they can never be taught to harmonize the two. And yet that is a bold man who can regard "St. James" as an "Epistle of straw."

So long as giving is considered as something distinct from the worship of God, and worship as something distinct from giving, there will be pangs and "death's off" in all parts of Methodism. Besides the faith which was involved in the burnt-offerings and thank-offerings in the Levitical system, there was considerable cost.

"I will not offer burnt-offerings without cost"—1 Chr. xxi.

Those types have given place to the offering "once for all," and upon that faith now fastens, not as the more economical propitiation, but as the more costly, upon Him who though rich, for our sakes became poor. It is impossible to realize by faith that "Gift of God," without feeling the grace of a self-sacrificing liberality. The man who does not give to Christ, does not know Christ. "I was as hungry and ye gave me no meat," fixes the condition and religious status of thousands of Methodists. So great should be, is the impulse to serve Christ in the hearts of the truly converted, that there is with them a constant enquiry and desire to give even beyond ability. That urging from any quarter should be thought necessary, is an entire misconception of experimental piety.

To give an idea of how great an art has been lost: it will be seen by calculation that the large sum of $1,500,000, recently raised by the Centenary movement of Northern Methodism, did not equal $2 per member; yet to raise it, one man gave half a million, and several gave over $50,000 each. Whoever can bring back, or discover the way to collect regularly, at intervals of one week, any given sum, from every member of the church, will have done more for the benefit of mankind than James Watt did by inventing the steam engine. This great problem must have forced itself upon the attention of Mr. Wesley. And we think he came nearer solving it than any one has since his day. He divided his people into small financial "companies" of "about twelve persons" and appointed one person to take charge of each of these "companies." It was his duty. "To see each one in his company once a week at least;" and "To receive what each was willing to give toward the relief of the preachers, church and poor." To make this convenient, these companies were arranged "according to their respective places of abode." In connection with this financial part of worship there was properly associated prayer and christian conversation. For this giving was a religious act.

But, by and by, there arose men in charge of these companies who misconceived their object, and who ignorantly felt too religious, or thought one could be too religious to "talk about money." Meetings were held not to make collections, but to pray, and to tell experiences. The prayer-meeting had already provided for the first, and the Lovefeast for the second; and this last arrangement was mainly for money—for collecting thank-offerings, wave-offerings, firstlings, first-fruits, the fine flour, the oil, the wine, and whatever else could represent love, gratitude, and a holy desire to serve and to please the Author of all good. When these meetings became only for grace and not for giving, they fell off in both directions. And no wonder: people who do not make a business of giving, need not make a business of praying. For God has ordained that the life of praying is giving. And let any one should think this too strongly put, we cite the inspired statement of the apostle James. "For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also." Mark, in this passage faith is not represented as the soul of works, but works as the soul of faith. The apostle is speaking, of course, not of "works of the law," but of the works of faith, those works which have in them the element of love, and spring from faith in Christ. Faith giving quality to works, and works giving quantity to faith, acting and reacting mutually until "faith is made perfect." Therefore, what we now need is a restoration of Mr. Wesley's common-sense method of collecting religious monies. Call these financial circles by any name, and those set over them by any name; only, let them meet, once a week, to give; and, if there be time left, to pray; and, if still more time, to talk.

AID AND COMFORT.

"Letters of commendation" are in themselves a great comfort to an Editor, who, next to an author, is of all mortals the most sensitive to praise or blame. Still good words, like the songs of birds in the air, borne off on the passing breeze, leave only the faint vibrations of a departed pleasure. But blame sits in sight, on a dead limb, and is as hard to scare as "Poe's Raven." After these reflections, the reader can prepare his mind for what we are about to state, as a fact to which we could "be qualified." We have received two letters during the week, by the same mail, from two different points, and two different persons, each containing, not the subscription-price of the Advocate, but five times that, not to pay for the paper, but as an expression of approbation at its new appearance. Such acts do one good like a medicine. They are like the nightingale, which sits on the thorn-bush, and with her song keeps up the thought of day until the darkness is gone.

LOUISIANA LEGISLATURE.

The General Assembly of Louisiana met on Monday last. There was a quorum of both houses. A characteristic message was received from Governor Wells. He recommends the passage of the Constitutional Amendment, as something greatly to be desired, but doesn't suppose that the recommendation will have any effect. He feels it due however to himself to show that he has the moral courage to advocate it. And even if they should, contrary to his expectation, pass it, he has no notion that it will avail any towards the rehabilitation of the State.

The Legislature to call a State Convention. Several Rail Road enterprises are presented; all of which are regarded with favor. The prospect is, that the Chattanooga and New Orleans Road, via Mobile, and the Brashear city and Orange Texas Rail Road, will immediately receive all Legislative aid necessary to their successful and rapid completion.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE AMERICAN ARTIZAN and Patent Record, $2 50 per annum, Brown Coombs & Co., No. 189 Broadway.

A most excellent publication for artisans, inventors, scientific men, who wish to keep abreast with the discoveries and improvements of the century. It gives regular reports of Patents taken out in the U. States, with valuable wood-cut designs of mechanical inventions.

THE EPISCOPAL METHODIST, Published at Raleigh, N. C., H. T. Hudson, Directing Editor, W. H. Cunningham, Publisher. Subscription $3 00, To Ministers, $2 00. Organ of the North Carolina Conference, of the M. E. Church, South.

The enterprise of our people seems to increase with the difficulties of the times. We welcome all signs of life; and this sheet is already mature. We suppose that it comes forward in the place of that able sheet we used to see before the war, the North Carolina Christian Advocate. The name of this Journal is a little premature maybe, but evidently wise men are about it, and they maybe more knowing than we. We wish it 10,000 subscribers this year.

THE METHODIST HOME JOURNAL, is the name of a beautifully printed paper, devoted to religious intelligence, news, literature, poetry, and art. Printed in Philadelphia—Church North—purely literary and religious, no politics, 108 South Third street.

REPRINTS OF BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEWS—By Leonard Scott, Publishing Co., No. 38 Walker street, New York.

After having availed myself for twenty years of this great source of information, we can earnestly commend it to all who wish to keep up with the steady advance of this century. Here the business man can find as much of Science, Theology, Literature and Political Economy, as he can find time to read every three months; and those who wish to go deeper in any direction of knowledge can here be informed of what the great minds in the world are accomplishing, and how to accompany them.

THE CHILDREN'S FRIEND, Richmond; 50 cents a year; published twice a month—address, Rev. Jacob Manning, Box 429, Richmond, Va.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

REMOVAL.—Messrs. Rice, Bros. & Co., have removed to their roomy and elegant establishment, Nos. 89 and 91 Camp street. They are extensive dealers and importers of Foreign and Domestic Hardware. These gentlemen began business in 1849, in the neighborhood of the Magazine street Market. By carefully managing a small capital, by unremitting industry, and by liberal views they have increased their original stock to one of the best in the city. It is another instance, of many that we have observed, where brothers, or members of one family, have succeeded by keeping together.

MRS. READ'S SCHOOL.—Previous to the war, Mrs. W. C. Read had been for a long period, the principal of a Female School in Baton Rouge. One of the best schools in Southern Louisiana. We are glad to see that she has re-established her Institution. It is situated immediately in the town of Baton Rouge. Doubtless many of her old pupils will now be her patrons.

MESSRS. BLACKSHER & MILLER, Cotton Factors, and General Commission Merchants, No. 13 St. Charles street. These gentlemen have been personally known to us, and to a large part of the citizens of this State for years past: Mr. Miller as President of Centenary College, and Mr. Blacksher as a successful merchant and planter of De Soto Parish. They are industrious and experienced business men. We can heartily commend them.

R. J. HARP, Agent, 112 Camp street, offers an excellent stock of books from the Publishing House of the M. E. Church, South. Also some rare works which we shall notice next week.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

MRS. MARY W. DORMAN.

Wife of Rev. Dr. T. W. Dorman, died in Mobile, after an illness of six days, Dec. 23rd, 1866. Sister D.'s maiden name was White. She was born in Loudon Co., Va., in 1802, was married in 1825, professed religion about 1828, and united with the Methodist Church, from the membership of which she has gone to the Church triumphant.

In 1836, Bro. Dorman removed to Ala., and settled in Montgomery, where the family resided four years, at which time, the close of 1839, he entered the Alabama Conference. Although this was a sphere of life not anticipated by sister Dorman, at the time of her marriage, and it cost her a struggle to become reconciled to it, yet having once gained her consent to it, and being once in the position of an itinerant minister's wife, few ever submitted to its inconveniences and sacrifices with more readiness and cheerfulness than she. In an acquaintance of more than twenty-five years, I do not remember to have heard her utter one word of complaint touching her lot and its privations, though she had her share of them. This is rather a rare thing in this age; for whatever the "mothers in Israel" did formerly, but few of the daughters quite get their consent to submit to all that awaits the wife of an itinerant minister, without occasionally making comparisons between their lot in life, and that of many of their lay brethren, which are not promotive of tranquility and contentment.

Not to do this, they would need, if not to be more than human, yet to have the human very much subdued by grace. For the estimate put upon wealth and its advantages, not by the world only, but by the mass of those professedly religious, is such, that the minister and his family are made to feel it in a thousand ways; and alas! too many are succumbing to it. But with the Bible open before us, how can any man be judged to be fit to be a minister of Christ, who is not willing to be poor for His sake. Sister Dorman rose nobly above temptations from this source, judging that it was an honor to be placed in a condition of dependence for Christ's sake, and awaited the coming of the day of Lord, with its adjustment to justify her opinion. She exhorted herself to promote her husband's usefulness in his calling, and to perform her share of the work. In this she was untiring. As the natural result, she made numerous friends wherever she resided. She identified herself with, and took an interest in the circumstances and welfare of the community, and especially in those of the church, and all that pertained to it.

She had a heart of sympathy especially for the afflicted. The sufferings of the poor, called forth feelings of deep concern; she interested and exerted herself in their behalf. She was, especially kind and attentive to the sick and bereaved. Relieved to a great extent by other members of the family, from the routine of domestic cares and duties, she gave much of her time to the ministry of kindness and mercy.

Was a family within the circle of her acquaintance bereaved, whoever else failed to find time to visit and console them, sister D. was sure to do so. Was any one of her neighbors sick, whoever else might forget, or be too busy to call and see them, she was sure to perform that duty, not tardily, and with excuses when the patient was convalescent, but promptly. Thus many a home made dark by bereavement, or sad by sickness, was consoled by her presence, and cheered by her sympathy. To such she was an angel of kindness. Our departed sister bore a very strong and unqualified attachment to her church. She could not tolerate the vacillations of those whose fickle friendship and feeble perceptions, and convictions, led to indifference to its weal, and inaction in its service. The church had been the medium and fountain of so much of the joy of her life, and was so linked with all her hopes of the future, that she wanted the hearts of its children and professed friends to glow with ardor for its welfare.

Sister Dorman's piety was uniform and progressive. Her seat in the sanctuary was seldom vacant, nor was she often absent from any unusual means of grace to be enjoyed in the city, whether in the church where she held her membership or not. Her Bible was her daily companion; she perused its pages with unflinching attention, and a devout spirit. As a consequence, "her heart was steadfast with God," and her preparation for heaven advancing. This was especially apparent through the last months of her life; and when the hour of trial drew on, God most mercifully sustained her. The lingering vestiges of cloud, that "sight" had left, were graciously lifted from the horizon of her setting sun, and it went down under a clear sky and smiling heaven.

To her attending physician, she said, not long before her departure: "Dr. I am not afraid to die, I am ready." She remarked that heretofore she had "contemplated death with some dread and shrinking, but during this sickness," she had "meditated upon the subject, and found no fear, but pleasure in the thought,—felt that it would be going home." Her whole soul and nature seemed melted, and taking a finer mould under the grace and goodness of God. She grasped the hands of all the friends who visited her, with unwavering fervor and affection, and pressed them to her bosom with deep emotion, seeming to feel that the time of her departure drew nigh, and that she was seeing them for the last time, though the family did not then, seriously apprehend it. In this frame of mind, she passed on to the banks of the narrow stream that divides us from the land of the blessed; and the celestial boatman being ready, she passed safely over. Gently and sweetly as the music quits the string, her spirit left its earthly home for the one above. Many members of the two Alabama Conferences will feel sad at reading this notice, as they will call to mind, words and acts of kindness received at her hands during their years of service. And next in solemnity to the call that bids the watchmen retire, and vacate his place upon the walls, is that which calls away those who have ministered to his wants while there.

But the Master has another place of service for such.

"That place—but who may claim it? The guileless in their way, Who keep the ranks of battle, Who mean the thing they say,— Strive, man, to win that glory; Toil, man, to gain that light; Send hope before to grasp it, Till hope be lost in sigh."

FROM OTHER CHURCHES.

CATHOLIC.

A CATHOLIC PRIEST TURNED PROTESTANT.—A remarkable event took place recently at the Clark Street M. E. Church, Chicago, where a prayer meeting was being held by the members of the congregation. During the course of the proceedings a Roman Catholic priest, Rev. Father Kenny, of Dubuque, arose and formally renounced his faith in the presence of the congregation. Father Kenny has officiated for several years past at Duquene. Serious doubt of the Roman Catholic faith in saving souls have for some time agitated his mind, and he finally determined to adopt the Protestant creed. He stated his reasons for so doing to the meeting, and produced credentials from the Bishop and clergy regarding his character, which were entirely satisfactory.

It is understood that Father Kenny will immediately proceed to New York in the interest of the Evangelical Alliance, to operate there upon the Catholic community.—Chicago Tribune.

CATHOLIC BISHOPS.—The Catholic Mirror states that there are already forty-eight Bishops in the United States, with a prospective addition of at least fourteen others. It is stated that the Pope has addressed an invitation to the bishops of the Catholic world to assemble at Rome in the month of June, 1867, to celebrate the eighteenth centenary of the martyrdom of the Apostles Peter and Paul, and the canonization of several martyrs, confessors and virgins.

BAPTIST.

OPEN COMMUNION.—The Second Baptist Church of San Francisco, Rev. A. Sawtelle, pastor, has had a division on the question of baptism; Mr. S. believing that if Baptists can preach and pray in fellowship with other denominations, they can also meet with them at the Lord's Supper.

131 students have matriculated the present session in the Waco (Baptist) University.

The Baptist State Convention, of Texas, has taken steps to raise $100,000 for the endowment of a colored normal school.

CHURCH EXTENSION.—The Baptists of Philadelphia have made a proposition to raise $20,000 a year for several years to come, for the erection of a Baptist chapel annually. In this chapel a Sabbath school is to be maintained, and the Gospel preached. Already, we understand, the first $20,000 has been subscribed, and the choice of a location entrusted to a competent committee.

The Baptist Home Mission Board of New York have taken the first steps in a great and good enterprise. They have resolved to raise $250,000 as a Church Edifice Fund, and have appointed Rev. E. E. Taylor, D. D., to undertake the work of raising it.

PRESBYTERIAN.

Rev. J. C. Stiles, widely known as one of the most eloquent and laborious ministers of the Presbyterian Church, has been elected President of Oglethorpe University in Georgia.

CONGREGATIONAL.

POLITICS IN NEW YORK CHURCHES.—Plymouth Church was crowded on a recent Sunday, in the morning and evening—in the forenoon by a congregation eager to hear the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, who preached on II Cor. x: 5; and in the evening the Rev. Dr. Storrs, who discoursed on "The Bible." In the evening, also, Dr. Cheever delivered a discourse at his church, taking for his subject the "Plans of Rebel Reconstruction." He bitterly denounced the proposed amendment to the Constitution, stigmatizing it as a measure to which no Christian should assent, because it did not confer the franchise upon the freedmen of the South. The Rev. Dr. Spear, at the South Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn, delivered a sermon on "National Affairs," in which he approved the actions of Congress as contrasted with those of the President, and strongly advocated the adoption of the Constitutional Amendment, declaring it to be the ultimatum of the North.

UNITARIAN.

UNITARIANISM OF SLOW GROWTH.—The city of Boston has always been the grand centre and stronghold of Unitarianism in this country. In 1832, there were in that city, twelve Unitarian, eight Orthodox, seven Baptist, three Methodist, and five Episcopal Churches. Now there are fifteen Unitarian, fourteen Orthodox, fourteen Baptist, fourteen Methodist, thirteen Episcopal and six Presbyterian. In other words, while the Unitarian have been adding seven to their list, the evangelical denominations have added thirty-eight.

LATEST NEWS.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23.—The following is a synopsis of the President's veto message: I return the act admitting Colorado. My sense of duty prevents my approval. With the exception of the additional clause it is the same as that vetoed in May last, which still awaits the Senators' consideration. I am unable to perceive the reason for changing opinion. I see additional reason for confirming the wisdom of the former veto. The additional section make the bill more objectionable. The constitution of Colorado provides that the laws existing shall continue—among these one absolutely prohibiting negro suffrage. The recent territorial legislature almost unanimously refused its repeal, and pending the passage of the act by Congress, the territorial legislature passed an act denying jury rights to negroes. The bill before me grants rights denied by the legislature and constitution of Colorado. This incongruity and protest on the part of the people against a State government clearly indicate the impolicy and injustice of the proposed enactment; it is a subject of serious inquiry, whether the enactment is not an attempt to exercise power not vested in them by the Constitution. The President submits evidence of the repugnance of the people of Colorado to a State government. The total population of Colorado is 7,909; only one-fifth required for Congressional representation. He argues the injustice of allowing this small community one Representative and two Senators. Such admissions of States were not practised in the early days. Florida's admission in 1845 resulted from sectional strife, which we would do well to regard as a warning of evil rather than an example of imitation. He shows by the statistics that other States when admitted, had a population entitling them to one and nearly two representatives. Every organized territory is, equally with Colorado, entitled to admission. The logical precedent admits Dacotah, Montana and Idaho, when they present themselves giving us ten new Senators and five representatives, furnished by a population scarcely entitled to one representative, while in the existing States the average population for two Senators is now nearly two millions. He argues that the enabling act for Colorado was passed under false statistics and the deliberate decision of the people. Besides the bill is so framed as to render its execution impossible, and the question is whether it is or not in itself a nullity. He argues at some length the incongruities of the bill, and concludes that the admission of a State is regarded as an epoch in history, making the progress of the nation, but we cannot see that the proposed proceeding accords with the uniform policy of the government in the admission of new States.

An informal meeting has been held, at which there were present two cabinet officers and several prominent radical senators and representatives, for the purpose of discussing the question of the impeachment. The general tone was decidedly in favor of not proceeding with it. It is rumored here to-day that Gen. Sherman, Gen. Stedman, and other officers of high rank, will urge the President to call new counselors to his aid, and to review the situation with reawakened energy. Gen. Sherman has not yet arrived in the city; but the members who held the conference purpose visiting the President to-morrow. The Hon. Reverdy Johnson is prominently mentioned in connection with the proposed new cabinet, although it is understood he will occupy a position without a portfolio. The State of Texas, through counselor George Taylor, has commenced an action against the secretary of the treasury, for the delivery of indemnity bonds alleged to have been fraudulently procured from the military board. The question of the political status is involved in the suit. The Southern loyalists, so-called, now in this city, are preparing a special bill to be proposed to Congress for the re-organization of the State of Louisiana. LONDON, Jan. 30.—It is stated the members of the British cabinet express the hope that the peace of Europe will be preserved, despite the threatening appearance of affairs in the East. The search of baggage of foreign travelers in England and France will hereafter be merely nominal. Pans, Jan. 30.—It is thought here the mission of Kalergia to the United States is a Russian intrigue to involve the American government in the Eastern question.

CITY NEWS.

Last Sunday a little after noon, in accordance with the announcement previously made the remains of Governor Henry W. Allen, recently brought to this city from Mexico, were conveyed to Christ Church, and were there received with the ceremonies that are usually shown the dead.

The arrival of the body had created a deep feeling throughout the city. The deceased had discharged the highest offices of the State with a popularity which has been seldom equalled. He had struggled in the late war with a gallantry which won the respect of his enemies and the devotion of his friends; he had left the State with no animosities following him, and every heart grew sad at learning that the worthiest of Louisiana's sons had ended his life in exile.

So that it was not singular that the announcement of funeral services over his body should have filled Canal street with a numerous throng long before the appointed time. At the exact hour every pew, and each side of the gallery were filled, mostly with ladies. A large number of visitors were compelled to remain without.

At half past one, the coffin, covered with black velvet and overspread with the richest flowers, appeared at the door, and was met by Bishop Wilmer and several of the Episcopal clergy of the city.

The pall-bearers were Theo. G. Hunt, John L. Lewis, E. W. Halsey, John M. Sandidge, Wm. S. Pike, Oscar Arroyo, Ernest Miltenberger, M. Hanley, Harlow J. Phelps, Wm. Bull, J. B. Corkern and Henry Dennis.

The funeral service at the church having been concluded, a procession was formed at the door, headed by the hearse and pall-bearers, followed by a large procession of ladies on foot, and a still larger attendance of gentlemen. A long string of carriages completed the procession. It passed through immense crowds of spectators on Canal, and continued up Magazine, the way being bordered upon each side by dense throngs of spectators upon the streets, at the windows and on the galleries. The procession extended more than twenty squares, and altogether contained about five thousand persons.

OBITUARIES.

Departed this life the 14th December, 1866, in the town of Black Hawk, Carroll county, Miss., sister ELIZA JANE COLE. Sister Cole was born in Fayette county, Ala., May the 7th, 1815. Following the teachings of inspired wisdom, to remember her creator in the days of her youth, she professed religion, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, at the early age of fifteen years; from that time period until crowned with venerable age, she lived a constant member of the church of her choice. She was married to Mr. Wm. R. Cole, Jan. the 3rd, 1839, in the twenty-fourth year of her age, with whom she walked with God for twenty-four years, but who she survived a few short years, and then went to meet him in glory. She always expressed an unfeeling interest in the welfare of the church, and a lively concern for the spiritual welfare of her children; all of whom, five in number, she lived to see united with the church of her choice. For the greater part of her life she was in feeble health; as she expressed it herself: "for more than twenty years she had not seen a well day." Her life gradually wore out, and she passed away as one falling asleep. The last conversation she had with any one, was with her eldest daughter, in which she expressed perfect satisfaction as to her prospects for the heavenly world.

NEW SOUTHERN MUSIC BOOK.

Just published

TABOR;

Or the Richmond Collection of Sacred Music.

By R. MONTGOMERY, of Virginia.

The attention of Choirs and Musical Societies generally is respectfully asked for this new and popular collection of Church Music. Its author for four years an officer in the Confederate Army composed many pieces in moments snatched during his marches and counter-marches. The death of the author, a musical reputation rarely attained—at the head of Church Music, no one disputing the position with him, and besides it, and ever has been, one of us.

Says the Richmond Whig—"The writer is well known throughout the South as an author of finished excellence; a musical reputation rarely attained—at the head of Church Music, no one disputing the position with him, and besides it, and ever has been, one of us."

Says the Spartanburg (S. C.) Express: "After a careful examination of Tabor, we have no hesitation in pronouncing it a Musical Gem. Its original compositions give the work a distinctive character, while the selections embrace those good old tunes which have come down from our fathers as an invaluable legacy. Here, also, may be found a number of traditional melodies, which, for half a century or more, have been sung throughout the South and Southwest, and never before in print. We can heartily recommend it to Churches, Choirs, and all lovers of Sacred Music."

It has been largely introduced and highly recommended by many of the Churches in Richmond and Petersburg, where the author is best known. It embraces all the metres in use, in every key and variety of measure, with a full elementary department and fine collection of new anthems, set pieces, and sentences. It contains nearly 300 closely printed pages, neatly and tastefully gotten up, well printed and bound. Price—retail, $1 35; $12 00 per dozen.

Can be obtained through all booksellers, or will be mailed by the Publishers to any of the United States, post free, on receipt of retail price.

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

A Story for the Little Folks.

A NEW ROBINSON CRUSOE.

In the midst of the Indian ocean there is a little island called Providence. It was called by that name by a ship's crew who were saved there after their vessel had been struck by lightning. It lies in the channel of Mozambique, and if any of my little readers have a map at hand, I hope they will search it out; for then I think they will be more interested in what I am now about to relate. You will find it not a great many days' sail from the island of Bourbon.

In the year of 1820, the captain of a merchant vessel made arrangements to sail from Bourbon to Providence, in order to get a load of the scions of cocoa trees, which grow there to an unusual size. At that time the building and sailing of vessels at Bourbon was by no means well understood. Little sailing boats did nearly all the business which was done, for they could go up over the reefs that surrounded the island, while the larger vessels could not do so. The only anchor which was used was a box filled with stone, and instead of having a large chain to hoist it and lower it, the anchor was held only by a rope made of the bark of trees.

Captain Cremasy had a favorable voyage from Bourbon to Providence. He sailed close up to a reef, and cast anchor. Taking one of the little boats connected with his vessel, he proceeded to the shore, and then sent the boat back again by the two sailors who had rowed him ashore. While he was walking about on the little island, and admiring the magnificent cocoanut trees, the rope that held the anchor broke, and the wind, which was blowing very heavily at the time, drifted the vessel off. In vain did the sailors try to control the ship and get it back against the wind and tide, for their efforts were of no avail whatever. Night came on, and the captain lost sight of his vessel. He had nothing on except his light clothing, neither did he have any weapons of defence except a short pistol. The next day there was no sign of his vessel, and on the evening of that day he came to the conclusion that he was now on a desert land, and that he must make the best use of his solitude that he could. By the aid of stones and fallen leaves he built himself a little cottage, and by opening a number of cocoanuts, and drinking the milk, and eating the fruit, hunger was satisfied. But he knew he could not live all the time on cocoanuts. He accordingly went to the center of the island to see if he could not meet with some other kind of food. He discovered during that walk some wild cucumbers and wild beans and peas; all of which he thought himself very fortunate in finding. The birds were very numerous and quite tame. By one shot of his pistol he killed two pigeons.

It now occurred to him that people used to make fire by rubbing wood together. He made the same effort, but on the first day he did not succeed. Another morning came, and he went down to the shore as soon as it was light, to see if there was any trace of his vessel. But he saw nothing save sea and sky. He made a second effort to kindle fire, and this time he succeeded. He brought cocoanut shells together, and had the great satisfaction of seeing them all in a blaze. That evening he was very tired because of his labor and anxiety, and he lay down to rest. He heard a rustling near by him in the leaves. Was it a poisonous serpent? He opened his eyes, and with a trembling heart he looked at the great broad animal that was crawling up towards him. Cremasy seized his pistol and made himself ready to kill anything that might oppose him. He soon saw that he had to deal with a large turtle, which had come to shore to lay its eggs in the sand, where water in the sea could not reach them. These animals always choose those places for laying their eggs where the beams of the hot sun can shine upon them all day. They then make a hole in the sand, lay their eggs in it, cover them over with sand, and by a wonderful instinct of nature, return again after the lapse of fifty days to take away the sand. After they have done this, the little turtles creep out and follow their mother down to the seashore. So soon as she goes into the water, they climb up on her back, and learn from her how to enjoy their new life in the sea.

So soon as captain Cremasy knew what kind of an animal it was he went to it and turned it over on its back. Of course it could not get away. The next morning he killed it, and the meat lasted him several days. He kept the fat in cocoanut shells, and with it he was able to make a good light at night. I suspect there have been worse lamps in the world than captain Cremasy's cocoanut shells filled with turtle fat. In order to salt the turtle flesh, he had to get some sea water and sprinkle over it. After having eaten his turtle, he saw that the large shell was a splendid dish for future use. He found it difficult to get fresh water to drink, but by seeking a place where a little spring bubbled up from the ground, and by digging deeper down, he made for himself quite a good well of water. The only enemies that he had to contend with were rats, and at night he was always compelled to take great care against their attacks. Cremasy's clothing became threadbare, and scarcely covered his body any longer. How to supply its place was a grave question with him, but he had managed to weave with his fingers a kind of cloth out of the thinnest inside bark of the cocoanut tree. In due time he was clad from head to foot with a cocoanut suit.

He naturally had a very strong desire to get relieved from his solitude. From early in the morning till late in the evening, on some days, he would lie on a rock and look out over the broad sea. Had his vessel struck a rock and gone to pieces, or had it sailed back again to Bourbon, and did the people there know anything of his fate? But he was a Christian man, and he felt that God would provide a way for his deliverance. He determined to raise a signal which might be seen far and wide over the sea. It was a signal of a very different kind from that usually employed. It was a ball cocoanut bark, saturated in oil. He took it to the top of a tree, and resolved that just as soon as he could see a sail he would set it on fire; of course the sailors could see it from a great distance. But day after day passed on without deliverance.

Cremasy began to conclude that his fate was hopeless. One day as he sat buried in thought, a new hope arose in his mind. On the way to the shore he collected a few muscels for his supper. Suddenly he saw a vessel far off in the horizon. But was it not an illusion?—for he had several times been deceived before. Previously the clouds had formed into such shapes that he thought they were vessels, but after giving them a little time they would disappear and be lost forever. But this time Cremasy noticed that the clouds changed, while the object that he saw with his keen eyes always remained the same. His heart now beat with hope. Yes, it was a ship, and it came nearer and nearer. He went to the top of the tree where his signal was lodged between the two topmost branches, around which all the leaves were cut off, and he set fire to it. Immediately a high pyramid of flame arose. It was perfectly dazzling, and a great deal larger and more beautiful than Cremasy had any idea of before. Three minutes elapsed, and it was answered by a cannon shot from the vessel. The signal had been seen and understood. Cremasy stayed there hour after hour until midnight came; then he heard the sound of a vessel near to the outer reef. He then called aloud with his strong voice, and his cry of joy was answered by shouts from the sailors on the deck of the vessel. They spoke his own language. They were the sailors on his own ship, that had been driven far away by storms to the island of Anjouan, not far from Majotte, and they had now returned to deliver their captain.

The new Robinson Crusoe wrote the story of his solitude of months, and stuck the paper in a bottle and hung it on a tree in the neighborhood of the shore. It was found there about a year afterwards by a French sailor, and it was taken to France and published. You can imagine what an excitement it made, especially among the little folks.

Chinese Winter Oration.

The Chinese baby's winter cradle is a kind of basket, made of straw, very thickly twisted. In shape it is something like an hour-glass. There is a hole at the top and one at the bottom. The little baby is put in at the top, and under the basket, on the floor, is placed a pan of heated charcoal, to keep its feet warm. The babies in China have all kinds of toys, the same as English children.

In summer the babies wear very little clothing, but in winter they are so padded with cotton that they look like little bolsters. The poor mistaken mothers in China generally put before their dear little ones an idol, thinking it will protect them from harm. They do not know God, and therefore never ask Him to be their protector.

Let us pray that the time may soon come when the little Chinese children will be taught the sweet saying of Jesus, "Suffer little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."—The Children's Friend.

A Very Poor People.

This is what we call ourselves, and, no doubt, very correctly; yet there are signs among us, that would not indicate deep poverty. There is an amount of extravagance exhibited by those, whose incomes must, beyond all question, be moderate, that is alarming. It displays itself most conspicuously in dress. We are not macmillan enough to go into particulars; but we cannot but be struck at the flash and glare and tinsel that mark every assemblage where we meet the fashionable attire of the present day. To say nothing of the bad taste of so much gaudy ornament, which would befit semi-civilized communities better than it does an enlightened christian people, there is always a sorrowful sense, at sight of it, that much of this has been bought at a cost of home comforts, of wholesome food, of education—and it may be at the more fearful cost of a life-struggle on the part of an indigent husband or father; perhaps, at the risk of a financial ruin, that no energy on his part can avert. How men, in this day, when the struggle for life is so exhausting, can sustain themselves under the demands that fashion makes upon their families is a mystery that we cannot solve. We fear that, in many cases, the mystery will be solved, in a way to pain many a heart, now thoughtless of the consequences their extravagance threatens to those whom they devotedly love, and whose loving indulgence encourages and supports it.—Southwestern Christian Advocate.

Thoroughly Drilled.

The Scotch are drilled from childhood in the study of the Bible, and, as a natural result, there have been fewer heresies in Scotland than in any part of Christendom. Dr. Guthrie alludes to this in the following paragraph: "When George Whitefield came to Edinburgh nothing struck or pleased him so much as the sound that rose in the church when he happened to quote a passage of Scripture, giving book, chapter, and verse. His hearers, as was their wont, had taken God's Word with them to God's house; and as they turned up the passage, the leaves of two thousand Bibles rustled like the sound of the wind among trees in his astonished ear. To their thorough Bible knowledge instruction, illustrated by that anecdote, and given to her youth in the house, and in all her schools, and to the complete drill and training which children, young men and women, get in that shorter catechism, which, the work chiefly of English divines and a remarkable compend of theology, takes a hold of the mind singularly firm, Scotland owes it, that though a hundred storms have blown, and blown their worst, she rides today over the very ground where the reformers dropped their anchor three centuries ago."

CONVERSATION.—How incalculably would the tone of conversation be improved if it offered no exceptions to the example of Bishop Beveridge: "Resolve never to speak of a man's virtues to his face, nor his faults behind his back." A golden rule, the observance of which would at once banish flattery and defamation from the earth.

Conversation stock being a joint and common property, every one should take a share in it, and yet there may be societies in which silence will be our best contribution. When Socrates, dining with the King of Cyprus, was asked why he did not mix in the discourse of the company, he replied, "What is reasonable I do not know, and what I know is not reasonable."

A brilliant talker is not always liked by those whom he has most amused, for we are seldom pleased with those who have, in any way, made us feel inferiority. "The happiest conversation," says Dr. Johnson, "is that of which nothing is distinctly remembered, but which leaves behind a pleasing impression." "No one," says Dean Lockier, "will ever shine in conversation who thinks of saying fine things; to please, one must say many things indifferent and many very bad." This last rule is rarely broken in society.—Western Christian Advocate.

VEGETABLE SOUP.—Two potatoes, two onions, two turnips, one carrot, a little parsley chopped fine, salt, to the taste. Cut the potatoes in quarters, slice the onions, cut the turnips in quarters, slice the carrots. Put all in a stew pan with three pints of water and salt to the taste. Boil it down to one quart. About fifteen minutes before it is done add the parsley. Strain it and serve with light bread or toast. This is the receipt of a late eminent physician of Philadelphia.

THE LAW OF SUCCESSION IN CASE OF AN IMPEACHMENT.—Whenever the offices of President and Vice President shall both become vacant, the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause a notification thereof to be made to the executive of every State, and shall also cause the same to be published in at least one of the newspapers printed in each State, specifying that electors of the President of the United States shall be appointed or chosen in the several States within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December then next ensuing: Provided, There shall be the space of two months between the date of such notification and the said first Wednesday in December; but if there shall not be the space of two months between the date of such notification and the first Wednesday in December, and if the term for which the President and Vice-President last in office were elected shall not expire on the third day of March next ensuing, then the Secretary of State shall specify in the notification that the electors shall be appointed or chosen within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December, in the year next ensuing; within which time the electors shall accordingly be appointed or chosen and the electors shall meet and give their votes on the said first Wednesday in December, and the proceedings and duties of the said electors and others shall be pursuant to the direction prescribed in this act.

A THOUSAND DOLLARS A DAY.—George Peabody, since 1852, has given away $4,000,000, an average of about $1,000 a day for 14 years, if we omit Sundays and holidays. The Newport Herald well says that such an example ought to break the seats upon other fortunes larger and smaller than his.

DOLBEAR COMMERCIAL COLLEGE.

On the corner of Camp and Common st., (In the spacious and elegant Story Building.)

It is constantly in session under able Professors. It was founded in 1832, and is chartered by the State. Its former students may be found as Principals or Bookkeepers in a large portion of the houses of this city and over the Southern States. Ladies or gentlemen can attend the COMMERCIAL COURSE, or Bookkeeping, Penmanship, Mathematics, English, French or Spanish, separately. A business education that enables one to earn $1000, $2000, or $3000 annually, is the best fortune parents can give their sons. A DIPLOMA from this College is a passport in all commercial communities. Ladies and gentlemen are invited to call. We have ample arrangements for 1000 students the present year. Liberal arrangements made for Clergymen or their sons and crippled soldiers. Catalogues sent to all who desire them.

LATEST FASHIONS.

Call for
J. W. BRADLEY'S
DUPLIX ELLIPTICAL
[Or, Double Spring]
SKIRT!

THEY WILL NOT BEND OR BREAK
Like the Single Spring, but will preserve their perfect and graceful shape when three or four ordinary Skirts are thrown aside as useless—hence are the CHEAPEST.

Each Hoop is made by braiding two springs together, edge to edge, forming the STRONG, EASY, most FLEXIBLE, and still the LIGHT-EST Hoop made.

In fact, for promenade, or the house, or the church, the theatre, or for crowded assemblies, railroad cars, carriages, etc., they are superior to all others, affording COMFORT TO THE WEARER, with that ELEGANCE OF SHAPE which wins favor with all, and has made the "DUPLIX ELLIPTICAL."

The Standard Skirt of the Fashionable World. For misses and young ladies they are superior to all others.

Manufactured exclusively by the owners of the Patent.

WESTS, BRADLEY & CARY,
97 Chambers, 75 and 81 Reade sts., New-York.

CAUTION.

The Duplex Skirt will admit a pin being run through the centre of each hoop, thereby proving there are TWO SPRINGS braided together, which is the secret of their remarkable STRENGTH and FLEXIBILITY—a combination not possessed by any SINGLE SPRING Skirt.

The retail stamp, viz: "J. W. BRADLEY'S Duplex Elliptical Springs," will be found upon the waistband of every Skirt; none other are genuine.

CENTENARY COLLEGE,

Jackson, Louisiana,
1825, and transferred to the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1851. It is now under the joint patronage of the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences.

The College exercises were necessarily suspended during the war, but were regularly resumed, after reorganization, on the 1st Monday in October, 1865. The approaching session will open on the first Monday of October next.

Tuition, $75 per annum, payable semi-annually, in advance.

Boarding can be obtained at from $20 to $25 per month.

The Buildings, Libraries, Apparatus, Laboratory and Society Halls, the location in point of health, ease of access and good society, are all unsurpassed by those of any institution in the Southern States.

The past history of the College is the pledge of its future prosperity.

The Board and Faculty promise the public that no fee shall be waiting on their part to secure the thorough education of the young men committed to their care, in both Preparatory and Collegiate Departments.

The old students, alumni, and friends of the Institution, are requested to give publicity to the full reorganization and opening of the College, as stated above.

W. H. WATKINS, President.

SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY,

GREENSBORO, ALA.
The exercises of this institution will be resumed on the first Wednesday in October next. Instruction will be given in the Schools of Ancient and Modern Languages, Mathematics, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Chemistry, Natural Philosophy, and Biblical Literature. Civil Engineering and Analytical Chemistry will also be taught.

TERMS:
Tuition fees per term, $10 00
Contingent fee, 2 00
Board can be obtained at $20 to $25 per month

W. M. WRIGHTMAN, Chancellor

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE AT

BATON ROUGE.

The fifth session of this school will begin on Wednesday, 31 October, 1866.

The objects of the school have ever been to afford a good classical and scientific education, or a complete preparation for any stage of a College or University course.

TERMS: Tuition and Board, per month, $10.00
Payable $200 in advance; balance on the 1st of March.

Every student who enters the school is expected to remain to the close of the session in July, and will be held liable for the bills in all cases, unless protracted illness shall compel its removal.

Pupils are required to furnish their own bed clothing, towels, wash-basin, soap, &c., &c.

Circulars can be obtained by addressing me at Baton Rouge, or Rev. J. C. Keener, D.D., New Orleans, La.

As the number of students is limited, it is earnestly requested that application be made as soon as possible.

18 CAMP STREET, 18

Under the City Hotel.

We respectfully call the attention of all parties desirous of encouraging HOME MANUFACTURES to the various styles of

LADIES' SUPERIOR CALF WALKING SHOES AND DRESS BOOTEES, MISSES' HEAVY SCHOOL SHOES, CHILDREN'S STRONG SHOES

AND MEN'S AND BOYS' CALF, AND KIP BROGANS,

Which we are now daily receiving from our Factory. These goods are made here, of Louisiana Tanned Leather; and we flatter ourselves fully demonstrate that manufacturing in the South is no longer an experiment, but with the proper encouragement from all who are interested in such enterprises, we promise better stock, more faithful workmanship and superior goods every way, to any Eastern goods, and for the same class of work at low prices.

We aim to manufacture all the goods we sell, and to that end we are turning out new styles every week.

A trial for this work is cordially solicited from Merchants, Planters, and all persons requiring good Shoes.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

Since the publication of our last issue the general market has exhibited more activity, and several of the leading articles have undergone a notable alteration. Sugar and Molasses have been in active demand, at higher prices, and Western Produce has evinced its usual vitality, attended, however, with less firmness in Corn, and a notable improvement in Flour, while operations in our leading staple have been to a liberal extent, and, under the influence of favorable advices from Liverpool, prices have been attended with a reactionary feeling, the market closing yesterday at our quotations, with a tendency to increased firmness.

COTTON—On Saturday, although factors were evidently willing to make concessions, there was a restricted inquiry throughout, and consequently the sales at the close were unusually light, comprising barely 2000 bales at 10c lower. On Monday there was a liberal inquiry, and factors, under the influence of favorable advices from Liverpool, succeeded in imparting a firmer feeling to operations, the sales at the close comprising 6850 bales at stiffening prices. Yesterday the market opened with a continuance of the previous demand, to which the receipt of additional advices from Liverpool imparted increased activity, and although the views of holders were materially in advance of the limits of buyers, an unusually large business was transacted, the sales footing up 11,000 bales at higher prices, the market closing at our quotations with a stiffening tendency.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 18,146 bales, against 15,943 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 2203 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 448,968 bales, against 420,974 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest date, as compared with last year, is 115,544 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 110,088 bales to Great Britain, of 16,860 to France, and an increase of 8567 bales to other foreign ports.

TOBACCO—Is in good demand, but the stock is altogether too small for extended operations; 45 bbls. sold at 18c. Low Leaf at 6c. and 3 Fair non-sweet at 8c. per lb. An offer was refused for a round lot. The stock on sale is very much reduced, and is confined to about 500 bbls, mostly of desirable descriptions, however. The receipts of the new crop are light and sell readily as soon as offered. A number of foreign buyers are in the market, awaiting receipts from the West, and supplies would meet with good and immediate sale. We repeat our quotations for reference, although they are the inside prices:

The Coin market has been attended with less activity and rates have evinced little variation requiring special notice. On Saturday Gold opened at 134 1/2 to 134 1/2, and without disclosing any material irregularity, closed at the opening rate; it opened on Monday at 134, but subsequently improved and closed at 134 1/2, and opened yesterday at 134, but at a later hour advanced and closed steady at 134 1/2.

BY CHRISTIANA G. ROBERTS.

Oh the cheerful budding time!
When thorn-hedges turn to green,
When new leaves of elm and holly
Cleave and shed their winter screen;
Teeter larks are born and "baa"
North wind finds no soot to bring,
Vigorous Nature laughs "Ha, ha,"
In the miracle of spring.

Oh the gorgeous Blossom-days!
When broad flag-flowers drink and blow,
In mid out in summer blaze
Dragon-flies flash to and fro;
Athen branches hang out keys,
Oaks put forth the rosy shoot,
Wandering birds are sleek at ease,
Lovely blossoms eod in fruit.

Oh the shouting Harvest-weeks!
Mother earth grown fat with sheaves
Thrifty gleaner hods who seeks;
Husket-golden pomp of leaves
Crows the woods, to fall at length;
Bracing winds are felt to stir,
Ocean gathers up her strength,
Beasts receive their dwindled fur.

Oh the starving Winter-lapse!
Ice-bound, bludge-ploched and dim;
Dormant roots recall their saps,
Empty nests show black and grim,
Short-lived sunshine gives no heat,
Undue buds are nipped with frost,
Snow sets forth a winding-sheet,
And all hope of life seems lost.

THE FUNDAMENTAL TRUTHS OF CHRISTIANITY.

From the German, by Prof. J. B. A. AHNES.

CHRISTIANITY IN HISTORY.

That mankind were one family, was always believed by men of thought. Hence, animated by this belief, before and after Babel's tower rose to the skies, attempts were made to unite all people in one nation, and force all empires under one universal sceptre. Faint traces was this undertaken. Babylon's Nimrod commenced the giant task of national absorption; Persia's great emperor battled for the same; Greece, with its world of thought, struggled for nothing less; and also the Caesars' ambition found its food therein. Rome, more than other empires, was eminently successful in this national consolidation; for hundreds of races and tribes bowed to the sway of her eagle. Still, Rome, and with Rome, other empires failed in permanently uniting the various hostile elements of the human family. Howbeit, though, in a great measure, they failed, so far as they succeeded, contributed all their wars and all their work in preparing mankind for the reception of Christianity—Christianity, which without sword and lance effected the union of all nations. The Roman empire was, at the time of Christ's advent, the product, the quintessence of all previous national development; and yet the Caesars failed to rise from the national to the universal. Christ accomplished this. He became the aim and centre of all history. With Him commenced a new era, and that era is governed by Him.

Before Jesus bade his disciples adieu, He commanded them to convey the "glad tidings" to all nations, and baptize them in His name. This definite thought of the unity of mankind, supported by that all men embracing one religion, was the grandest ever uttered; and its realization is the greatest miracle ever witnessed here below.

All seemed to be united to render the victory of Christianity impossible. Public opinion was bitterly prejudiced against it, philosophers attacked it with the weapons of the intellect, and the governments with brute force. And yet it has conquered! It is vain to compare to this victory, that of Mahomedanism. Mahomedanism introduced itself as a religion of the world—a religion of conquest and sensual enjoyment, and its sermon was the sword. But only through conversion extends Christianity, its realms. Indeed, have external circumstances contributed to the success of Christianity. E. g. the vast extent of the Roman empire, the formerly unprecedented intercourse among all nations, and the almost universal sameness of language and culture. Indeed, was the moral tone of Christianity and its adherers a strong force. Indeed, was the blood of the martyrs, the generant of Christians. But, with all that, was it assuredly no easy task to conquer the "dread omnipotence of heathenism." All public, social, and domestic laws were founded in heathen religion. Hence, appeared the early Christians as rebels and outcasts. In addition to this, was all the existing intellectual culture intimately interwoven with heathenism. All this threatened Christianity with speedy extinction.

In all these contests, has Christianity conquered, and successfully withstood all subsequent attacks, no matter whether they were made with physical or intellectual weapons.

Christianity has brought on the age of humanity. Through it we realize that all men are members of one body—are one family. It has introduced the abolition of slavery. It has raised Eve's daughters to their proper position. It has made our hearths to scenes of bliss. It has taught that vengeance is not a virtue. It persuades through love—compels not. More: It has disenfranchised the conscience, and gives to his torn heart, consolation and peace. Thus, it has become a formerly unknown moral force. This force revived also man's intellectual life: the arts and sciences of our day are the offsprings of Christianity. And this Christianity can adapt itself to all the varied conditions of life: What various attitudes has it not assumed in the lapse of time! But in all these attitudes, it preserved its identity—its divinity. In short: The universality of Christianity has made it to the religion of the world. Hence, shows history that Christ was not mere man, but a being of universal significance, and the bearer of divine life.

CHRISTIANS FOR THE TIMES.

In the economy of the plan of salvation, there is not only progression, but also distribution. The history of Providence shows that God has a peculiar work for every age and generation. While the patriarchal age, the Hebrew people and the Gospel dispensation, all converged to one grand point, yet each had a particular work assigned it.

And as the work of Noah and Moses, the Apostles and Reformers, in their respective generations, was peculiar to them and their times, so it is with every generation and individual. It is said of David, that "he served his own generation by the will of God"—and of Esther, "who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" A good man is described, not only as a tree that bringeth forth fruit, but as one that bringeth forth fruit "in his season." Thus every man's duty grows out of his peculiar surroundings, and has direct reference to the wants of his day; and this is the reason why he was born in his particular generation, and not in another. As no one can occupy your position, except yourself, it follows that no one can perform the duties of that position as well and as easy as yourself; for, the most difficult duty may be easy in its proper connections, but hard and painful, when undertaken out of season. He only is the true Christian who attends to every duty in its season; who fills his appointed station, however humble, and directs the whole vigor of his mind, whether great or small, to the accomplishment of his heaven-appointed task. To do this, he must watch the signs of his own times; acquaint himself with the new phenomena of his age; study the controlling principles of his day—the wants of his generation—the resources to meet these demands; and adopt the best means to accomplish all these important ends.

In the Providence of God, the present generation are surrounded by extraordinary events—events, we believe, that may be so used as to widen our sphere of usefulness, by opening new channels for doing good. While some are rocked to sleep by the very convulsion which God designed to arouse them, let us avail ourselves of these times to labor more earnestly for God and humanity. Our whole social fabric is, just now, in a formative state; society is thrown up from its lowest depths; old lines of demarkation are rubbed out; the isolated and obscure are driven out of their hiding places—the mass are wandering in the chaotic fields of uncertainty; thus the multitude are drifting on these troubled waters, driving into a darker sea at every plunge, anxiously looking for some beacon to guide them into a peaceful harbor! The influences that are brought to bear upon the crude mass, while in this plastic state, will be the controlling influences for generations to come. We need, therefore, Christians for the times! Men of deep principles to sustain them amid the rage of this terrible storm; of burning zeal to stand along the beach of time, as the light of the world—peering far above the wreck that sweeps around, and throwing their brilliant rays far out on the coral reefs, to guide the storm-wrecked mariners to the cross of Christ. Men who will ride upon the crest wave of progress, rise upon the flood-tide of improvement, and keep pace with the spirit of the times, to mould and direct them all, and make each subservient to the advancement of the kingdom of God. We need Christians of "stern metal," who will ring out clear and strong upon the world, to call it to a pause in its mad career; men of prudence and powerful faith, who can stand like the storm-swept rock—the same amid the combined shock of winds and waves—unmoved by the taunts, or sneers, or ridicule, of the skeptical and profane; men of moral power to command our resources and direct our energies—to arrest the proud monarchs of crime, the devotees of fashion, and the worshipers of mammon, and secure their allegiance to the King of kings, and Lord of lords!

Every one has some power he can use for doing good; either to contrive plans, or labor in their execution; to encourage them by his influence, or support them with his means; to assist by his example, or further them by his prayers. O, who can tell of the latent energies and dormant powers that are slumbering in the very midst of souls going to ruin! Truly the harvest is great; but the laborers are few. Where are the men and women that ought to be in this great harvest field, gathering fruit unto life eternal? Alas! some are running the giddy rounds of worldly fashion; some are immersed in business, making fortunes that may "drown their souls in perdition"—others are nursing the vain delusion that there are yet four months until harvest—and others have become weary in well-doing, and given over the struggle before the appointed time for reaping. But, thank God, there are some still at their post—guarding, with faithful vigils, the vestal flame glowing upon the altars of the church, waiting, in patience and with earnest supplication, for the manifestation of that glory that will announce the coming of the King of Saints. Who will join this faithful band, and go forth in the great work of spreading scriptural holiness over these lands?

J. M. BOLAND.

THE BALLOTING FOR U. S. SENATORS. Continues in the Louisiana Assembly. Messrs. Boyce, Gayarre, and E. J. King, have received the largest number of votes.

WEEP NOT FOR ME, BUT WEEP FOR YOURSELVES.

These words were spoken by the most wonderful of beings, the God man, Jesus of Nazareth. They were spoken under the most extraordinary circumstances, when immaculate innocence was dying, the just for the unjust. The pious and sympathetic daughters of Jerusalem, filled with an exalted admiration of the Saviour's character, and grateful for all his beneficent works, deeply deplored his unjust and cruel fate, wept at the sight of his mortal agonies. Jesus bids them weep not for him, but for themselves and their children. He needed no human tears, or if he had, he had passed the bounds of human sympathy, and must tread the dreadful winepress of the wrath of God alone. His sufferings in a few brief hours would be past, and that day he would enter into paradise. So near a prospect of "the joy set before him," was a matter rather of envy and congratulation.

But he does not tell them to cease to weep. No, they were fallen creatures, they lived in a world blasted with the curse of sin. They were born unto trouble, and doomed to die; and as Jewish women and inhabitants of Jerusalem, a city doomed so soon to experience a haughty conqueror's wrath, they had especially more need to weep for themselves and helpless children, than for Him who needed not their tears.

The language of the Master, as he hung enduring life's last agonies, has often been the language of his dying saints, to loved ones who have stood sorrowing round—"Weep not for me, I'm almost home." For the pious dead sorrow not; but rather let us shed penitential tears, that we are not more like the sainted and the blest, and not better prepared to join their holy company, and warble their immortal songs.

If we could draw aside the veil that separates the earthly from the heavenly, and the mortal from the immortal, we should hear the glorified—(If allowed to speak to mortal men,) say to the loved and sorrowing left yet on earth, "weep not for us, we are forever free from pain, from fear and death, weep not for us, but weep that you are not more holy, that you are not better prepared to enter into rest, where there is fullness of joy, and pleasures forever more."

A FRAGMENT.

Some men are self-reliant, and others are dependant. The self-reliant man is not necessarily proud, or vain, he may be truly humble; but he has a just appreciation of himself, he weighs himself in the balance of truth. He knows what he can do, and when he has done it, he knows what he has done, and the value of the performance. He is not dependant on the opinion of others. If others condemn what he has done and pronounce it valueless, he does not become disgusted with his work. On the other hand, if his efforts are too highly appreciated, and too much praised, he does not become puffed up with an exaggerated view of his abilities and success.

He has weighed and considered his work, and cannot be much deceived as to its real value. Such a character may be illustrated by the solid and self-sustained oak, that stands upon its own broad base, and deep fastened roots. Its robust and well-knit trunk resists and defies the storms of succeeding seasons. The self-reliant man thus holds up his own head, and needs not to lean upon another for support.

The dependant man is one who cannot or will not truly weigh himself, and justly estimate the value of his labors. He is never satisfied with anything that he has done; until he has the judgment and estimation of others. If others are silent, and indicate no opinion of his performances, he is restless, dissatisfied and fearful, that his success has not been what it ought to have been. If others condemn his efforts, he is thoroughly unhappy and disgusted with himself, and with what he has done. If per contra they approve and praise him, he is made for the time supremely blest, and is in imminent danger of thinking of himself and his labors, "more highly than he ought to think." This phase of character may be illustrated by the vine. The vine is beautiful, and is capable of bearing the rich purple clusters, sweet and desirable, but it must have something on which to lean, and to which to cling, or else it will fall prone to the earth. These dependant people often have value, and are capable of great usefulness, but it is almost essential that they should have a little judicious praise now and then; and it is a duty and charity when we meet such to bestow it.

HOW CHILDREN ARE BADLY TAUGHT TO SING.

Dr. Lowell Mason, in answer to the remark that he might be regarded as the father of our church music, said to me, not long since: "And, when I see the abuses that have crept into our public worship under the name of church music, I am seriously disposed to question whether what I have done was a good or an evil service."

I confess that I am inclined to raise the same question with regard to the work which many are doing in teaching our children to sing. While nothing would seem more desirable than that the rising generation should have a taste for music, and should be able to sing; and while, both in the public schools and the Sabbath-schools, much is being done ostensibly to secure this end, there are two grave evils attending the method of instruction pursued, which are almost enough to condemn the whole effort.

One of these evils is the certain tendency of the method adopted, not only to establish in our youth the habit of singing wholly by rote, but also to unfit them for the patient study and practice necessary to the attainment of the power to sing by note,—that is, to unfit them for the acquisition of any true and solid knowledge of musical science or art. And, that this is just what is being accomplished in these schools (and more especially in the Sabbath-schools,) no one at all conversant with music and with the method pursued, will be disposed to question.

Of the causes which lead to this evil, of its inherent absurdity, and of its mischievous results, I do not propose to speak here, in detail.

My main design is to notice the other of the two evils. That is the utter disregard of the nature and wants of the child's voice, so commonly manifested in the course pursued. Scientific knowledge on this point might not, perhaps, be reasonably expected in public, or Sabbath-school teachers. But it would seem impossible that simple common sense should not suffice to show any one who has sufficient capacity to sing or to teach singing, that the child's organs are, neither in capacity or established character, those of the adult; that his voice is, neither in pitch, compass or power, that of the grown person; and hence, that his future wants, either as speaker or singer, require training and a practice altogether peculiar. Like his whole physical structure, the child's vocal organs are immature and slender, and, while capable of incidental and temporary exertion of considerable force, are wholly unfitted for sustained and violent effort. The thin quality and high pitch of the child's voice, while well adapted for the varying uses of his ordinary utterance, are wholly unfitted for full and powerful musical expression. What the child needs in his musical training, is, not the present volume or force, but that development which, when he comes to maturity, will invest his voice with the purity and richness of tone and modulation so necessary alike to the perfection of reading, speaking and singing.

And yet, how universal is the practice of urging the child, in direct opposition to all these evident facts, to sing loud,—louder,—as loud as he can! Not long since, I attended a Sabbath-school anniversary in which the leader gave this very command to the children. After they had sung one stanza of the hymn, with considerable childish naturalness and sweetness, they were checked as if they had been guilty of a fault, and were addressed thus: "Now, children, I want you to sing the next stanza louder—as loud as you can." Sing it louder they did, and, in all conscience, loud enough, if not as loud as they could.

But what were the results? Instead of that soft, sweet, natural, bird-like melody which is peculiar to the child's voice, and which is one of the most beautiful and impressive of all vocal utterances, there poured forth a sort of falsetto chorus, shrill, sharp, harsh, as if every separate note was being grated across the cutting edges of broken crockery. Noise enough there was, but little enough of melody. The whole performance was unnatural, overstrained and painfully discordant.

And what was the effect produced upon the listeners? The still, breathless attention, the subdued and tender felling, the deep and quiet delight, which all true music produces? Not a bit of it! On the contrary, every face turned to its neighbor with a sort of bustling vivacity, and at once broke into a broad grin of merriment; as if each one would say: "How the little fellows put in!"

Now, I ask, under such a system, what are we to expect of the voices of the coming generation? What can result from this over-exercising and straining of the vocal organs of children, (to say nothing of its depraving influence on their musical taste,) but that, from the hardening of the muscles and thickening of the vocal cords, the voices of the coming men and women shall be found destitute of all true flexibility and sweetness.

ARTIFICIAL EYESIGHT—SINGULAR, IT TRUE.—The Revue Francaise, says that a French physician, Dr. Blanchet, having arrived at the conclusion that we do not see with the eyes, but with the brain through the eyes, experimented with the view to find some means of conveying the rays of light through diseased eyes to the retina. After eighteen years of study he has at length perfected a discovery which must be of the greatest importance. By the aid of a little glass cylinder, to which he gives the name of port lumiere, he puts the optic nerve again in communication with the exterior world, and enables the blind to see. It is difficult, however, to believe that vision so obtained can be equally distinct with that of the natural eye.

That eminent Christian nobleman, Lord Shaftesbury, has addressed a letter to the London Times, in which he appeals to the laity to arouse themselves and not allow "S. G. O." to stand alone and unaided, while he is fighting their battles on the subject of Ritualism. He says the laity have the power in their own hands, and if they will only exercise it, the cause of orthodoxy will be saved. But if from a variety of reasons they decline to do so, a miracle alone, and nothing less, will save the Reformation in Great Britain. He does not undertake to affirm anything in the name of the wealthy and professional classes in England; but ventures to affirm, from his long and intimate knowledge of the other classes, that the majority—the vast majority—of the thinking working people of London and the North regard the Ritualistic system with dislike, and the principle of it with apprehension.

ORDINATION OF A COLORED DEACON. The Southern Churchman, of Dec. 27th, says: "On Sunday last, at 3 p. m., Bishop Smith, (Protestant Episcopal) of Kentucky, ordained Mr. Joseph S. Atwell (colored), Deacon. The service was participated in by a profoundly interested congregation of colored people. It was held in St. Paul's church, Louisville. Mr. Atwell has officiated during the past summer in St. Mark's (colored) church of this city as lay-reader. He is recently from the Divinity School, Philadelphia; is a good scholar in general literature and sacred philosophy, and a complete theologian. We think that the work inaugurated among the colored people of Louisville, through him, will, by the blessing of God, prove a success."

THE "MUZZLED" OX.

There is one infection in the church we would notice. It is apparent in the ministry; but whether it be in the ministry remains to be noticed. Sometimes the symptoms of a disease appear in one part of the system while the disease itself is located in another, and remote part. This seems to us to be the condition of the disease in question. The ministry are in some sort the surface of the church; and whatever affects the church, signs of it may be traced on this surface.

I allude, to the falling off of our ministry, the vacancies constantly occurring in their ranks, and the following of other vocations by the dilettos. That this is true, we admit; I am told that thirteen members of the Louisiana Conference, either located or transferred, at its late session. Are they in fault? It is a question that may be lightly passed over or indefinitely answered; yet it is a question that must be answered, either here, or hereafter. Let us glance at the history of the ministry of the Louisiana Conference, who are they? A body of men, many of whom were born elsewhere, reared elsewhere—joined the ministry elsewhere.

Men fired with a zeal to save souls came to this land of epidemics, with their life in their hands, where there were no churches, no church members, and where friends to the church were rare. They came not knowing but they would be swept away by cholera or yellow fever within a year, yet they came. They knew that indifference, ill will, and persecution awaited them, but still they would come. When Christ commands, woe to him who obeyeth not, "blessed is the man that goeth forth weeping, bearing precious seed." Doubtless these men were blessed, societies were planted, churches were built, schools and colleges founded. Then set toward Louisiana that swelling tide of emigration. Her waste lands were reclaimed, her forests cleared away, plantations fenced, and farm houses and villages sprang up all over the land. In the meantime, the land mania raged. Princely fortunes were made in almost a day. I knew one man, who ten years previous to the war, was worth nothing but his chain and compass. In five years his wealth was estimated at a half million of dollars. The bare information of one quarter section of land, was frequently worth five hundred dollars. Now, there was no class of men so well acquainted with Louisiana lands as the Methodist itinerant.

There were no bayons or swamps that they did not cross, no cane breaks they did not penetrate, no rich alluvial tracts they could not describe. Larger and readier fortunes awaited no class of men in the South-west, than awaited the Methodist preachers of the Louisiana Conference. Yet of all this body, comprising from fifty to one hundred men, how many yielded to this golden temptation? I can remember only two; and I am not sure they did. Their loyalty to the cross, and to the poverty of the cross is unparalleled in modern Christianity. Now I would ask, would these men, who have closed their eyes to the glitter of proffered fortunes, preferring their religion and its poverty, (yes and its wealth,) would they, after the country is prostrate, her wealth swept away, and the prospect of future wealth has entirely vanished, would these men break their allegiance to Christ and His church for the sake of filthy lucre? Perish the thought! That may be true of the ministry of other States; but it is not, it cannot be true of the ministry of Louisiana. Yet the one has turned to his merchandise, the other to his farm, while the third is wending his way toward the sunset.

Mr. Editor, the private life and the heart-life of the preacher for the two years last past, is keenly felt but not easily told. An empty purse, a scanty board, and a worse than thread-bare wardrobe, are companions not likely to sow the seeds of happiness and concord in the occupant's heart. I do not wonder that thirteen of our number located and transferred, but I do wonder that thirty had not transferred, or located. But even adversity is bearable if one meets with sympathy; a kind word—"I feel sorry for you" occasionally. But that is denied him.

Nabobs who have grown rich through the guardianship of vigilant David's, now watch their em-banked wealth with all the church-lishness of their selfish prototype. But even this is bearable, if we could meet with sympathy from those professing our faith. See a preacher who has ploughed all of last year, for bread to enable him to preach on Sundays: see him as Conference approaches—his heart yearning to meet his brethren; but no money to pay his way—doomed to disappointment; see him appointed to a new field: see him on his new work—a letter comes by post from a minister, not an itinerant, never was one, but one who reaps the fruits of the united efforts of itinerants, and who is made rich by those fruits. He writes thus:

"Dear brother—glad you have returned to the itinerancy. Hope you will never leave it. You preach well, you can sway the audience and achieve a great deal for the church."

"Brother, you will not forget that I am in charge of a church enterprise, I am doing well—(doubtless she is) I wish brethren to understand, it is their enterprise—and can't you do great things for us this year?" Now, Mr. Editor—this provokes me; not to anger, for anger cannot do justice to the occasion; not to laughter—for it is too much like the frogs in the fable; but it does provoke me to something, and as I cannot express it, I will just keep silence. But I am met with another class: they speak thus: "My brother you do wrong to teach, to plough, to sell goods, you are to preach, you will be provided for; your faith is weak." These are grave statements, and I respect them.

Mr. Editor—Reciprocity is the life of trade, and reciprocity is the life of the church. It is written: "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn." I understand by this, that the ox must tread, and that the ox is not to be muzzled. Query: if the ox be muzzled, should he then be compelled to tread out the corn? I understand it thus: that if the ox is muzzled, he is no longer under obligations to tread out the corn. The contract becomes voidable. And thus the corn is trodden out by a sort of reciprocity.

But the ox is muzzled. When there are only five bushels of corn in the granary, I think that granary is muzzled. When there are only fifteen pounds of meat in the smoke house, I think that smoke house is muzzled. When there are only five dollars in the purse, I think that purse is muzzled. What is a preacher to do who has a family dependant on him for a support? See them starve? or, resort to any means honest, to make for them bread?

Members of the church; the fault is in you. Support your ministers and they will minister unto you in spiritual things; and if you will not—before you censure your minister for toiling for bread for his family, try to pillow your head on this Scripture, (don't try to pillow your head on it, it can't rest there.) "He that provideth not for his own household, hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." O.

QUESTIONS.

1. Did there a case occur within the knowledge of any man in the South, in which any officer, soldier, or any follower, approved at the time, or condemned afterwards, a robbery, house-burning, murder, rape, or any other of the hideous crimes perpetrated through the land by "our Northern brethren," on the ground that he was a Methodist, and his religion would not permit him to participate in, or countenance such enormities? If there was such a case, let it be reported for the honor of humanity, and the credit of the Northern Methodist Church.

2. Is it known that any Conference Bishop, or Presiding Elder, cautioned any member of the church on entering, or while in the army, not to participate in any of the above or similar crimes, but to remember that they professed to be Christians, and to conduct the war, so far as they were concerned, on the principles of modern civilization and humanity?

3. Has any inquiry been instituted by any Conference, or other church authority, into the conduct of ministers or members who were in the army? Has any effort been made to ascertain whether any of them participated in any of the above crimes; or whether any of them were guilty of theft, and have now in their libraries or houses, books, silver-ware, or clothing, which they took from the owners, while in or following the army?

4. If the proof that such crimes were committed by both ministers and members, during the war, was furnished, would the proper authorities investigate the cases? and if the charges were sustained, would the guilty parties be dealt with?

These may seem to be very small matters with our "Northern brethren," but they have their weight with us. And until we can have some satisfaction upon such points, our Northern friends need not waste their time, and ink and paper, discussing the terms upon which we could be admitted to their communion. Somebody else will have something to say on that point, when the time comes.

CANDOR.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

TREADING IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF THEIR PREDECESSORS.

The Northern Church certainly has ancient precedent for its bloody zeal for "loyalty," as will be seen by the following: "The Jews answered him, we have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God. * * * And from thenceforth Pilate sought to release him; but the Jews, (loyal men) cried out, saying, if thou let this man go, thou art not Caesar's friend, (no friend to the government) whoever maketh himself a king, speaketh against Caesar."

Thus it will be seen that the Son of God was crucified for "disloyalty"—for constructive "treason," against "the best Government the world ever saw"—i. e. against the party in power. And if he were on earth now, and did not agree with the dominant party, and should speak out openly, he would be sent to Fort Lafayette, or executed. Nicodemus and Paul both, could not shield him from the charge of "Copperheadism." J. H.

THE FLIGHT OF TIME.—There are many things of which we have a much more vivid perception at some times than at others. The thing is before you; but sometimes you can grasp it firmly—sometimes it eludes you mistily. You are walking along a country path, just within hearing of distant bells. You hear them faintly; but, all of a sudden, by some caprice of the wind, the sound is borne to you with startling clearness. There is something analogous to that in our perceptions and feelings of many great facts and truths. Commonly we perceive them and feel them faintly; but sometimes they are borne in upon us, we can not say how. Sometimes we get vivid glimpses of things which we have often talked of, but which we had never discerned and realized before. And for many days it has been so with me. I have seemed to feel the lapse of time with startling clearness.

I have no doubt, my reader, that you have sometimes done the like. You have seemed to actually perceive the great current with which we are all gliding steadily away and away.—Fraser's Magazine.

GROWING LIBERALITY.—The pastor of the Third (New School) Presbyterian Church, Pittsburgh, states that his congregation paid on church subscriptions, during his first year, $10,000; the second, $19,250; the third, $53,600; the fourth, $59,000.

ECCE HOMO.

Not as in our English version, Behold the Man, (John xix, 5,) as a mere object of our gaze, but, Lo the Man, standing forth as a living power in the world to awaken our wonder. And in few works in this age of Christologies does the divine man stand out with so striking a delineation, as the volume we now notice. We say this in full view of the fact that leading evangelical divines have delivered the most pronounced condemnation upon the work. This condemnation, arises, we think, from a mistaken view of the author's real purpose. If the work should be read as a standard of a true evangelical theology, the condemnation is just; but if it be read as a reply to Strauss and Renan, demonstrating, by a somewhat new and original method, that their Jesus-picture is a pitiful failure, it will be found, we think, an invaluable and indestructible addition to our body of Christian defenses.

For this mistake of many critics as to the object of the work, the author himself is greatly responsible. In the first place, he has scattered through his work a number of very unnecessary as well as very calumnious slurs upon the most earnest class of the professors of the religion he is defending. And, second, he hangs out a false guide-board in his very preface, announcing that his object is to depict a fresh study of Jesus for "those" (mark the pet phraseology of "our small dabblers in pantheism") who feel dissatisfied with the current conception of Christ. Nor is it until his fifty-second page that it occurs to him to tell us that "the present treatise aims to show that the Christ of the Gospels is not mythical, by showing that the character those biographers portrayed is in all its large features strikingly consistent, and at the same time so peculiar as to be altogether beyond the reach of invention both by individual genius and still more by what is called the 'consciousness of an age.'" Now, in our own view, this work he has accomplished in a manner most conclusive against the criticisms of Strauss and the romancings of Renan. He demonstrates the existence of a reality underlying the inartistic Gospel narrations, so consistent and so sublime, that the conceptions of Renan as representations of Jesus' crisp into worthlessness in the comparison. The sound-minded thinker who has, for the time being, been seduced into the imagination that the poetizing Frenchman has presented a true Jesus, is very likely to be wisely ashamed of himself. Such a reader may, indeed, not feel that the exegetical criticisms of Strauss are answered in detail; that belongs to another department of investigation; but he is satisfied that, whatever becomes of the verbal text, the divine man whom it describes, with however imperfect a phrase, is real and is divine. Take for instance the history of the temptation. It is narrated by the Gospel writers in the plainest, most prosaic and fragmentary style imaginable; without the slightest tinge of idealism. Of idealism, indeed, the writers seem incapable. But through the dim and blurred glass of their homely text look keenly, and you will desire an idea grander than those men, grander than that age, grander than any age, has ever produced in its kind. The apologue of the Vision of Heracles is the nearest approach which classic antiquity could furnish. But compare the two in all their dimensions and qualities, and how infinitely inferior is the latter! When, who, and what was the genius that furnished the divine conception? With a masterly hand does our author trace in a similar way the great conceptions of the kingdom of God; His King, and His Law, delineated in the Gospels, and shows how infinitely the work is superior to the genius of the workmen. All this is done in a style of criticism which, though it may fail in occasional details, is marked with profoundest insight, with most delicate discrimination, and most self-evidencing conclusiveness. The diction is clear, incisive, eloquent. The march of the argument, though much may be left in suggestive incompleteness is onward and right onward. There are paragraphs and pages and chapters consisting of sayings hitherto unsaid and thinkings hitherto unthought.

Of course such an argument cannot be considered new in the sense that no germ or seed has hitherto existed of its nature. There is a paragraph by Rousseau, in which the vivid mental eye of that philosopher catches a most clear sight of the self-evidencing injustice of the Lord's person, and portrays it with an exquisite pencil. The superiority, out of all comparison, of the Son of Mary over the son of Sophroniscus, (Socrates,) is asserted in words of light. The construction of such a character by the four Evangelists, were a greater miracle than any ascribed to Jesus. This last is what Rousseau asserts, and what our author at full length demonstrates; and the demonstration, we say, is so complete, it so brings the one great personal miracle right before our eyes, that the appreciative reader can well afford to fling in the concession, as best of all the other miracles.—Methodist Quarterly Review.

An intelligent negro, who lives on the coast, called on us a few days since and gave us the following account of himself: "I was born and raised in South Carolina, converted and educated in the Presbyterian Church, and am seeking the right way and want advice; but since the war the preachers that come into our settlement say that there is a new law that the old law won't save people any longer; that the old doctrine, and the old preaching, and the old baptism, are of no account any longer; and that they can't take men to Heaven any longer; that there is a new law which has come from the city of Washington, which is the only law by which a black man can be saved; and that he must be baptised into the new law by men who have been sent from the city of Washington for that purpose, and pay a dollar a month to support the cause, and almost all the colored people are going after this new religion. Now, I want to know if these things are true?"

We inquired what answer he had made to the new doctrine. He said: "I told 'em dat I did not believe dat if God Amity would give a man a ting, dat he would take it away from him, unless de man laid it down hisself; and, derefore, de religion dat took men to Heaven before de war would do de same now. And, as to de money, dat I had been raised to believe dat if a man give five cents, it is more in de sight of God den a thousand dollars which do not come from a willing heart, and so I could not go wid de new law. Yit it is a mos' hard and difficult subje for me, and yon is de fust Presbyterian preacher dat I hev found, and I am come to de city for de spess purpose of asking yon advice."

It was our privilege to assure him that "the gifts and calling of God are without repentance;" that the city of Washington ist no referred to in Scripture as the one mediator between God and the negro; that whosoever believeth shall be saved, and that whosoever cometh shall in no wise be cast out; we of course advised him to learn to read the Bible at once, and satisfy himself as to the terms and nature of gospel grace, and to use all influence to induce his people to do the same—all of which he eagerly promised to do.

The former friends and instructors of the negro are now powerless to help him. A few such men as this are almost the only barrier between them and universal irreligion. May God bless their fidelity, but what are they among so many? It is sad to see that interesting race evidently rushing to physical extinction, but it is far more distressing to see all their spiritual light turned into darkness. It is the deliberate judgment of many of our most intelligent people, and we do not hesitate to say it is our own, that the victorious philanthropy of their Northern friends is doing all that human influences can do to consign the race, body and soul, to perdition.

THE INDIAN'S ANSWER.

In the Sailor's Magazine for the present month, April 1849, I noticed an article by A. Benner, of Union, Me., headed "Orono," in which he relates the following anecdote:

"A missionary asked Orono, the venerable chief of the Penobscot tribe of Indians, in what language he prayed? Orono made no reply, but assumed a grave aspect. The missionary repeated his question; but Orono without uttering a single word, looked still more grave. After a little interval, the missionary clasped Orono on his shoulders, and said, come Orono, come, tell me in what language you say your prayers, Indian, French, or Latin? He knew the French and Latin to be understood by the tribe, from their intercourse with the French Canadian priests. Orono, with a solemnity of countenance, lifted up his hands and eyes toward heaven and said, 'No matter, Great Spirit know all languages.' Orono departed this life on the 5th of February, 1801, at the age of 113. He was greatly endeared to his tribe, and spent his life in cultivating the principles of peace and morality."

I recollect the first time I remember to have seen Orono, which was in 1796. His conduct forcibly reminded me of that passage, Psalm 37: 5; "Commit thy ways into the Lord," etc. I was standing on the bank of the noble Penobscot, in company with several persons who were accompanying me to an appointment. We stopped to look at a fleet of Indian canoes approaching us from Old Town. As they drew near to the point where we stood, they unshipped their paddles and fell astern of Orono; he drew off his cap, and apparently engaged in devotion a short time before landing. And when they departed, as soon as he had seated himself in his canoe and shoved from the shore, he again uncovered, and after offering a silent prayer paddled off in his way for "Salt Water." This little incident has occurred to me very often when going out and coming in about the daily avocations of life. How instructing is this to Christians to set the Lord always before their eyes; to go out and in his fear and realize him as ever present with them. Orono's answer has often occurred at the sailor's prayer meetings, where I have heard many of different languages calling on the Lord and praising him for his goodness to them, in their outgoings and incomings—"No matter, Great Spirit knows all languages."—Zion's Herald.

CHRISTIAN UNION.

We extract the concluding portion of a letter from the Venerable Monroe to the St. Louis Christian Advocate, giving an account of his visit to the Council of the Christian Union.

"Here we rested again in comfortable beds for three hours, and were again aroused to take the train for Orléans, where the Council of the Christian Union was in session. We reached there at six o'clock Friday morning, and were met at the depot by Brother Howard, preacher in charge, who seemed glad to see us, and conducted us at once to his house, where we were most kindly cared for. Being at the preacher's house, where every one feels free, we soon made the acquaintance of most of the preachers. We found the Council was occupying the court house; no church in this city being offered for their use. The Bishop being fatigued, did not attend the morning service. The writer was introduced and cordially invited to take part in the deliberations of the Council, which was cordially accepted; so that during the session I felt very much like I was in a Southern Methodist Conference, and really enjoyed it very much. At noon, Bishop Doggett had an interview with the leading men, and satisfied himself that he could do nothing more officially than perform the duties of a fraternal messenger, which he did at the afternoon session of the Council in a most admirable manner, creditable to himself, and highly gratifying to the members of the Council. We had free conversation with their leading men as to their condition and prospects. It was stated privately, and in Council, that they have claimed more than four thousand members in Illinois, and some twenty-five preachers in the regular work. Such is the statement of Jones, Smithson, Holt, Westcott, Howard and others, all good men and true, who protested against being held responsible for exaggerated accounts. Now, I make this statement not to cast reflections upon any one, but as a conviction of duty as being best for all interested. If their success depended on their numerical strength, they might be discouraged, but that God this is not the case. Reform and Church movements have always been small in their beginnings. Think of the mustard seed—think of what the beginning of Methodism had to contend with—see what God has wrought, and let no one despair of the success of the Christian Union, for God is most surely with them, and who can be against them? Men of God in the ministry, a several thousands of pious, devoted members—all willing to bear reproach for Christ and publish a pure unmixed Gospel, and to build up under God a non-secular Church. Some have feared there might be something political in the movement, but I am satisfied there is no ground for such apprehension. The leaders were men persecuted as literally driven from the Conference and Church on account of their political opinions—did not organize this new convention in support of a political party, but that they might work for God according to the dictates of their consciences, and might preach Christ and Him crucified unmixed with politics. I am convinced, and so are the leaders of the movement, that a formal connection with our church would be a decided advantage—would inspire confidence in the stability of the organization, and thousands who are now distrustful would be good faith unite their religious fortunes with them. Upon consultation the preachers concluded to talk it over with the members, and when they are all satisfied will notify the Bishop, who expects to visit us again, in a few months; will then consummate the union. In conclusion allow me to express myself in favor of the proposition, because I verily believe it will be the means of building up a non-secular Church where it is greatly needed. I think God will be glorified, and thousands of souls saved thereby. I beg you will excuse the length of this article."

LOUISIANA CONVENTION.

Mr. McConnell, from the special committee on a constitutional convention, reported the subjoined bill.

AN ACT to take the sense of the people on the expediency of calling a convention to form a Constitution, and to provide for the election of delegates, and for the holding of the convention.

WHEREAS, The people of the State of Louisiana have had no opportunity since the termination of the recent war to remodel their organic law, and adapt it to the great changes produced by the war; and whereas the people have a right to assemble in convention, whenever they may deem a convention to be necessary, therefore

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana, in General Assembly convened, That on the second Monday of April, 1867, a poll shall be opened at each of the election precincts of this State, now established by law, for the purpose of receiving the votes of the qualified voters of the State for or against the calling of a convention to form a constitution for this State, and for the election of delegates to such convention.

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, etc., That the sheriffs of the different parishes in this State shall open the polls in the time, manner, and form now prescribed by law, for ordering a poll to be opened for the election of members to the General Assembly, without any further notice or authority to said sheriffs than is contained in this act, which the secretary of state shall cause to be published in the newspapers throughout this State during the thirty days next preceding the said election. And the said polls shall be presided over by the same commissioners, to be appointed in the manner, and the voting shall be conducted, and all proceedings had in the same manner as is now provided by law in cases of election to the general assembly, except as may be hereinafter ordered.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, etc., That the voting for or against the calling of a convention, and the voting for delegates to such convention, shall be conducted separately, though held at the same time and place. There shall be two ballot-boxes at each election precinct, in one of which every qualified voter, voting for or against a convention, shall deposit his ballot having written or printed thereon, the word "Convention," if he be in favor of such convention, according to the terms and condition and for the objects of this act, and the words "No Convention" if he be opposed to convention; and in the other ballot-box, the qualified voters of this State, voting for delegates to such convention, shall deposit their ballots, designating thereon the name or names of the persons, voted for as delegates for the senatorial districts, for those voted for as delegates from the representative district or parishes, as the case may be. Returns shall be made by the returning officers of the several parishes to the secretary of state of all votes received for a convention, and of all votes received for delegates to such convention in the same manner, time and form, as for members of the General Assembly, and said votes shall be counted and announced in the presence of the governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, and attorney general, or any three of them, and of such other persons as may choose to attend. That directly after the counting of said votes on the question of convention or no convention, the secretary of state shall cause the result to be immediately published in the usual manner.

Sec. 4. Be it further enacted, etc., That the delegates to such convention shall have the same qualifications now required by law for members of the general assembly, and the number of delegates to such convention for the several representative districts, parishes and senatorial districts of the State, shall be the same as fixed for the members of the General Assembly of the State, as prescribed in the act entitled, "an act to apportion the representatives in the Senate and House of Representatives in the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, according to the second census, made in 1853," etc., approved March 4th, 1859; and the districts and apportionment shall be made according to said act, which the secretary of state shall cause to be published in connection with this act, as hereinbefore directed, and to furnish to the sheriffs of the several parishes a copy of the same, and which said act is hereby submitted to the people as a part of the plan for the convention, for their ratification rejection, as the mode for organizing the same.

Sec. 5. Be it further enacted, etc., That the said convention, if the result of the election be in favor of holding the same, meet in New Orleans on the first Monday of May, 1867, the election to be conducted and the returns made according to existing laws, and as herein provided.

Sec. 6. Be it further enacted, etc., That the delegates to the said convention shall receive the same mileage and per diem pay to which members of this General Assembly are now by law entitled. The sum of sixty thousand dollars is hereby appropriated for the use of said convention to be drawn from the auditor, in favor of the duly constituted members and officers of said convention, and all other contingent and necessary expenses of said convention to be drawn from the treasury, or so much thereof as may be necessary, upon the warrant of the president of said convention, in such manner as the convention itself may prescribe.

Sec. 7. Be it further enacted, etc., That this act shall be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. McConnell remarked that by order of the House the bill, in anticipation of the report of the committee, had been ordered to be printed, and he requested that the sergeant-at-arms be directed to distribute the printed copies. Mr. McConnell believed the House was now fully prepared to act on the subject. The question involved had been fully debated at the last session, and had been freely canvassed at the present session, and, unless gentlemen opposed to the measure desired postponement, he would move to take the bill up immediately. If a postponement was desired, he would move to make it the order of the day for two o'clock to-day, or for some certain hour tomorrow.

The bill was allowed to lay over for the present.

Non-explosive Nitro-glycerine.

To miners, particularly, it will be interesting to know that that powerful explosive compound, nitro-glycerine, can be rendered non-explosive at pleasure. Since the terrible explosion at San Francisco, a little more than a year ago, a universal distrust has been felt in regard to using so apparently dangerous an agent, and it has failed to attract that attention among miners which it deserves. It is well known that the blasting effects of this oil are fully ten times more than those of powder, yet such has been the feeling of distrust in regard to it that not a pound has ever been brought to Sierra country, to our knowledge. It has been tried on the line of Pacific Railroad, and in the mines at Michigan Bluffs, with perfect safety and success. The compound has many advantages over powder, in the fact that smaller holes and less of them are required. Another great point in its favor is, the effect of the blast comes from the bottom of the bore-hole, consequently the hole need not be so deep as is required for powder. Another advantage is that it requires very little tamping; indeed, water simply poured on top of the charge has been used, though loose sand is preferred by those who have used it.

The maxim that the human mind can control whatever it can invent has never been proved more true than in the invaluable invention to make nitro-glycerine inexplorable, and thus harmless, by adding to it a certain quantity of wood naphtha. To make the same explosive again, a quantity of pure water added will sink the naphtha, while the glycerine will sink to the bottom. Any miner can separate the naphtha from the glycerine in any quantity he may choose, thus preventing accidents. Various experiments have been tried with the non-explosive compound, and it has been found absolutely impossible to explode it until the naphtha is removed.

There is no estimating the advantages of a general use of nitro-glycerine as a means of opening and working our mines, and by its superior effects rendering those mines productive which now will not pay for working, with the expensive powder-blasting in use. We trust some of our miners will give nitro-glycerine a trial and demonstrate to their satisfaction its superiority. —Mountain Messenger, Downsville, Cal.

Wool in the South.

The Baltimore Transcript, speaking of the great increase of the trade in wool in the United States, says: "The Southern States are better adapted to sheep husbandry than any portion of the world, and we would specially commend this branch of enterprise to the attention of their people. The idea entertained by some Southerners that the South is too warm for sheep to flourish, is entirely without foundation. Any part of Maryland or Virginia is admirably adapted for sheep-raising. The whole South has a most decided advantage over other parts of the United States for the production of wool in soil, climate, and abundance and variety of grasses. The winter feeding of the most favored part of the North averages 150 days, and costs, under the most favorable circumstances, 27½ cents per pound, while in the Southern States it is not necessary to feed in winter, except under the most extraordinary circumstances. The Southern States, including those west of the Mississippi river, embraces an area of four hundred and fifty thousand square miles; or two hundred and eighty-eight million square acres. The attention to sheep husbandry need not impair the cultivation of the great Southern staples."

THE BRITISH AND THE NEGRO.

Our Southern feelings carry us somewhat further than Dr. McCosh in this particular. We hold not only that the negro is not depressed below the forefathers of Britain "when the Romans conquered them," but that the condition of the negro—at least up to the time of the late unhappy war—is not so deplorable as that of the present white laboring class, as a class, in Britain. And we can but smile at Dr. McCosh's report of the opinions which he expressed to both Northern and Southern men touching the necessity of elevating the negro, by education—which we think it altogether likely they had thought of before—when we call to mind Kay's startling reports in 1850 of the condition of at least four millions of Dr. McCosh's own people. For it will be remembered that Mr. Kay, himself a Briton, appointed to work by the University of Cambridge, reported four million or more—one fourth of the population, in a condition of savage barbarism, vice and ignorance, that caused the blood of Southern slaveholders even to run cold. "One half our poor," said Mr. Kay, "can neither read nor write, have never been in any school, and know nothing of the doctrines of Christianity, or of moral duties; few of them care to instruct their children—scarcely any of them have sense even to desire to improve their condition in life—scarcely any of them ever enter into a place of worship—none of them understand anything of the phenomena of nature around them, of their situation here—or of the mysterious change before them. They live precisely like brutes—then die to go—they have never thought, cared, or wondered whither."

Here too, where the aristocracy is richer and more powerful than that of any other country in the world, the poor are more depressed, more pauperized, more numerous in comparison to the other classes, more irreligious and very much worse educated than the poor of any other European nation, solely excepting Russia, Turkey, Portugal, South Italy and Spain."

Such is British testimony to the condition of four millions of white people in the British Isles. We mourn over it, and could tell Dr. McCosh, should he be traveling in Britain that the elevation of this mass of ignorance, crime and poverty must be a prime necessity, that all that we presume has been thought of before. Dr. McCosh heard an Old School Doctor of Divinity here express complacently the opinion that the negro would be exterminated in a century. We venture to affirm that this was a Northern Doctor—who had admitted the infidel Jacobin dogmas of labor etc., into his vast generalizations. And we venture to assure him that to-day the Southern churches and Christians—amid all their poverty and desolation—are giving more thought and a larger portion of their wealth to elevate their four million of degraded negroes, than the British churches and Christians to elevate their four millions of degraded whites.—Christian Commonwealth.

A MILLION PERSONS STARVED TO DEATH.—A Calcutta correspondent of the London Times, December 7th, gives some painful details of the recent famine in the District of Orissa. A Government Commissioner has prepared a report, of which it is said:

A picture more heart-rending, facts more hideous, could not be given. The Commissioner estimates the deaths in Orissa alone at 500,000 to 600,000, and in some places he admits that three-fourths of the population have been carried off. Orissa had five millions. Add the mortality of Midnapore, which was as severely visited; of Ganjam and Ghotia Nagpore, which was terribly, yet more mildly, dealt with; of Calcutta, whose hospitals still tell so sad a tale; and of the other districts, where the sequelae, at least of starvation, carried off so many, and remember that the deaths are still going on at the rate of a hundred a day, and you will agree with the rough estimate generally accepted here that the number of victims will not be under a million. In 1838-39, when as little was done for relief as in 1866, the mortality in the Jinnah-Doab was 800,000. But the tale of victims in this Orissa visitation mounts higher than even that, as high as the greatest of all recorded famines in India—that of 1779.

THE NEGLECTED ART.

The kitchen is the heart of the kingdom, the true seat of government in domestic economies; who rules there rules supreme. A visit of ceremony for a few moments at a stated hour in the morning can confer no authority whatever. Neither, on the other hand, is it necessary to be meddling and muddling there perpetually, or to do anything contrary to the instincts of a lady in the way of espionage. It is simply this, that by being actually busied in the kitchen a short time daily, by taking into her own hands the management and execution of those arrangements which require the skill and involve the entire control of the house-keeping expenditure, a mistress effectually breaks the rod of power in her cook's hands, and can sweep away at once the "perquisite" system, the waste, and the dishonest understanding with the tradesmen; because she is in a position to know within a little what is really and honestly needed and consumed, and to give her own orders. Economy is not the sole benefit to follow. There is an old, but not yet superannuated, maxim, if you want a thing well done, do it yourself. The tangible results upon the dinner table would be no less satisfactory than the reduced cost of their production. Nor is this a matter of slight importance. The best nourished body is, other things being equal, the most capable of sustaining mental work and resisting disease. Bad cookery is slow poison to those who work hard. To set before a man who returns exhausted in mind and body from his day's work, a messy, unappetizing dinner it is, if it occurs, exceptionally, to spoil his temper, or, if that be misapplicable, his comfort for the evening. But if it occurs habitually, it is to knock ten or a dozen years off his lease of life. Then, too, it is no small satisfaction to be able, if hospitably inclined, to insure your friends a dinner which, if modest in its pretensions, is thoroughly excellent; not a spacious display, such as a second or third rate "professed" cook, or the neighboring confectioner would set before them; everything looking like what it is, and tasting of nothing in particular. Not to mention that there is a double zest in witnessing the comfort and the enjoyment of your guests, with the consciousness that some time and pains on your part have contributed to the result.—McMillan's Magazine.

We have in Paris various instances of progress, if this is what it should be called, in the way of furnishing food to all the world. It is not very long since a man was almost tabooed who believed it was not a sin to dine on horseflesh. Now there is a slaughter-house authorized by law for the preparation of these animals for the various processes of boiling, baking and broiling, and several butchers authorized to sell to whomsoever wishes to buy. But this is not all. A dinner was given a few days since in the environs of Paris, where sharks, dogs, cats, and rats were served in all the usual ways for tempting fastidious palates, and the palates pronounced them good. Whether this was their real opinion we do not know, but we have seen people who said they had eaten cats and they were quite as good as rabbits, and scarcely to be distinguished when well boiled. That all the above-named animals are common food among the poor of European cities, we have no doubt. The price of bread has risen within a few days, but there have been arrivals of several vessels loaded with wheat at Marseilles, and the government is doubtless making every effort to have an abundance; for if there is one cry above all others to be dreaded in this great city, it is that of "Bread, bread." God grant that we may not have to hear it.—Exchange.

The fine weather for the past week or two has caused our planters to put forth all their energy to prepare for the cropping season. Much land has been plowed, and could a sufficient number of laborers be procured, twice as much would be put in cultivation. The city seems to be filled with idlers whose services are in great demand in the country, and for which reasonable compensation would be paid. The old swindling game has been revived in New Orleans, and it deserves the attention of the city authorities, or at least the freedmen's bureau. Hands are hired from agents—part of the pay is advanced by the planter—the freedmen go on board the steamer, and at the first place she lands, they go ashore. A gentleman residing upon the Grosjean Tete was swindled in this manner a day or two since. These agents should be held strictly accountable for such behavior; and perhaps a little time spent in the Penitentiary with their associates, the freedmen, might open their eyes to the absurdity of such financial operations.—West Baton Rouge Sugar Planter.

FARM AND GARDEN.

Benefit of Farm Life.

The men who have left their mark upon the ages in which they have lived have done a great and noble work for the race, have been, with few exceptions, men of noble physical mould. The foundation of their greatness and of their fame was laid in the patient training of their physical powers. Such men were Washington and most of the worthies who were associated with him in the struggles of our liberties. Such were Clay and Webster and many of their contemporaries. Their early days were spent upon the farm, and the thoughts of their declining years were given to the improvement, and the embellishment of their respective homesteads.

The whole tendency of farm life is to develop the body healthfully and symmetrically. The child is not pent up in the narrow back yard of a city dwelling, nor turned into the thronged and filthy streets to pursue his sports. His eyes open first upon green fields and fragrant meadows, and his first footfall out of doors is upon the matted grass beneath the shadowy trees of his rural home. He drinks in health from every breeze, and all the scenes around him call forth that playfulness which performs so important an office in our early training.

So this leads us to speak of the influence of farm life upon the home virtues. No occupation can be more favorable to the cultivation of those qualities which are the charm of the domestic circle. The farmer is much more at home than is possible with any other men. How many are there in our cities who only see their families at evening or on Sunday? They live for their business; and this, from its location, takes them from home early and late. How many, for the same cause, forsake housekeeping and huddle into boarding-houses and hotels, where the charm and beauty of the family as God instituted it is entirely lost, and the children fall under a thousand unfriendly influences that would never touch them at home. With the best arrangements wealth could command in the city it is well nigh impossible to keep children under the influence of their parents, so that they may have a distinct family character, and bear the moral as they do the physical image of their progenitors. Parental influence, too, is dissipated amid the varied social influences to which they are subjected from their earliest days. Then what perplexities harass the man of business in the city—his capital often invested in profitless enterprise, exposed to the depredations of dishonest men, betrayed, cheated, ruined by knaves and bankrupts. From the very character of his business he has to trust far more of his available means to the integrity of his fellows than the cultivator. His debts are often scattered over a wide extent of territory, and collections are not only expensive but exceedingly uncertain. But his commercial credit depends upon this uncertainty, and he is often compelled to fall back upon nothing, a ruined man.

Feeding Milch Cows.

We do not, as a general rule, feed liberally enough. We do not use a sufficient variety of food for cows in milk; nor is the quantity anything like what might be fed to advantage, either in summer or winter. Many farmers seem to act as if they thought the food consumed were so much loss, so much to be added to the cost of keeping, rather than so much raw material used in the manufacture of milk. If they owned a mill they would feed into it all the grain it would grind, try to keep it running at full speed, and furnishing the largest amount of its products of which it were capable, taking into account of course, the wear and tear of the machinery. They would try to get the largest yield consistent with economy and good management.

The same rule ought to be adopted in feeding cows. Instead of being content with a small, or even an ordinary yield, we should feed so as to get all we can consistently with a proper regard to the health and protracted usefulness of the animal. They have carried this matter of feeding to a far higher state of perfection in Europe than we have in this country. It may almost be said to be reduced to a science, so minute and careful have many of the experiments and systems of feeding become.—C. L. Flint.

Time of Pruning.

It is a too common practice with farmers, and some professed fruit-growers, to prune apple, pear, cherry, and other trees, in mid-winter. We do not regard the season as the correct, or best one for the labor; and why? because if the operation is correctly performed, the cut made close to the bud or body, it is liable to dry hard, crack, and cause death of an unchecked condition of the bud in the one case, or decay of the trunk or large limb in the other. Very rare is it that wounds made in winter heal over readily. If the work is not carefully performed at the first operation—that is, if to save the bud from drying, we cut an inch beyond it, then the whole has again to be gone over in spring or summer; or otherwise, on the end of each branch so pruned, we have a piece of wood to die and decay.—Horticulturalist.

How to Relieve Choked Cattle.—I have fattened many cattle on potatoes, and always feed them whole, and occasionally one gets choked. I then put the animal in a yard, where there are bars, which I let down, so that she can jump over, but as high as she will jump. I then place her about two rods from the bars, with her head toward them, and with a good whip, well applied, I run her over the bars; on the opposite side the potato will fly out of her mouth. I have informed my neighbors of the remedy, many of whom have tried it, and in no case have I known a failure.—Aaron Lee, in Rural America.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

CREAM IN COLD WEATHER.—For some reason not yet known, cream skimmed from milk in cold weather does not come to butter, when churned, so quickly as that from the same cow in warm weather. Perhaps the pellicles, which arm the little sacks of butter in the cream, are thicker and tougher. There are two methods of obviating this trouble in a great degree. [One is, to set the pan of milk on the stove, or in some warm place, as soon as strained, and let remain until quite warm—some say, until a bubble or two rises, or until a skim of cream begins to form on the surface. Another mode is to add a teaspoonful of salt to a quart of cream when it is skimmed. Cream thus prepared will generally come to butter in a few minutes when churned. It is thought the salt acts upon the coating of the butter globules, and makes them tender, so that they break rapidly when beaten by churning.—N. Y. Times.

A VEAL PIE.—A part of a leg of veal, cut into small pieces, parboil in water enough to fill your pie dish; when about half cooked, take the veal out to cool; season the gravy with pepper, salt, a little mace and a little salt pork; dredge in a little flour, line the sides of your dish with paste, lay in your meat and gravy, cover it with a thick paste and cut a little hole in the top. Bake it half an hour.

A SOUP MADE QUICKLY.—Take two quarts of soup-stock, put it to boil with an onion, two carrots and one turnip cut fine, and season it with pepper and salt. If it is made of brown stock, add half a teaspoonful of cloves and boil it half an hour, then add a glass of port wine; but if it is made of white stock, put in half a teaspoonful of ground mace and a glass of sherry.

A GOOD PUDDING.—Four ounces each of flour, suet, currants, raisins, and bread crumbs, two tablespoonfuls of treacle, and half a pint of milk. Mix all well together, and boil in a mould three hours. Serve with wine or brandy sauce.

SHORT CAKES.—One pound of flour, a quarter of a pound of butter, a few caraway seeds, a quarter of a pound of sifted sugar, a teaspoonful of carbonate of soda in a cup of warm milk. Mix, then let it stand a quarter of an hour before the fire, roll out, and cut in shapes.

BUTTERMILK CAKES.—Two cups of buttermilk or sour milk, one cup of sugar, one piece of butter the size of a walnut, a teaspoonful of saleratus, spice to your taste, with as much flour as will make a thin batter, and bake.

Frederick the Great, in surveying one evening some of the advanced posts of his camp, discovered a soldier endeavoring to pass the sentinel. His Majesty stopped him and insisted on knowing where he was going. "To tell you the truth," answered the soldier, "your Majesty has been so worsted in all your attempts, that I was going to desert." "Were you?" answered the monarch; "remain here but one week longer, and if fortune does not mend in that time, I'll desert with you, too."

Professor Hall, of the New York Geological Museum, and Edward Maguire, of Saratoga Springs, are having a controversy, touching the bones lately exhumed at Coloes, N. Y. Professor Hall thinks they are the remains of a mastodon, which had lain in the earth 25,604 years; while Mr. Maguire asserts that they are the bones of a menagerie elephant, which died and was buried in Coloes 40 years ago.

New Orleans:
SATURDAY FEBRUARY 9th 1867.
THE NORTHERN SAMARITAN.

We had occasion during the past year to notice the "Fancy stocks of Northern Methodism"—to point out the fact that there was nothing heart-felt in the new-born zeal of the Methodist Episcopal Church for the colored man. That it was a cold speculation, gotten up like any Wall street stock, in order to pay. It would turn the tide of the popular enthusiasm in favor of missionary and other church enterprises, and by thus chiming in with the changes of Radicalism, would enable the Methodists to keep well in advance of the times, and obtain a commanding political influence. We stated then, as we do now, that all their interest in the colored man was confined to the South, that in the North, where, for long years, they have had free access to him, they had absolutely nothing to show in the way of either colored members, ministers, schools, or churches. We call especially the attention of the colored people in the South to these facts, as we can now confirm them. The Christian Advocate and Journal, of New York, can certainly be believed upon this point. The Editor in a recent article says:

To our personal observation it has always seemed that there was no place for colored people in the Methodist Episcopal Church within the free states. We do not write these things to reproach any one, but rather to point out a neglected duty, and if it may be, to effect a practical reformation. It is very doubtful whether in all our land there can be found any other half million of people more needing our Christian beneficence than these same free colored citizens of the Northern States. They have so long been outcasts and pariahs among us, that we have ceased to think of them as other people. Incapable, through poverty and lack of cultivation, of caring for themselves as communities, and remorselessly excluded from all social privileges among the whites, it is truly wonderful that they have not in still greater proportion found their way to the almshouse, the prison, and the gallows.

The truth is, as the Editor goes on to say, in the North "free negroes are an abomination." The Northern Samaritan has an abstract theory over which he can weep, but you must not impose upon that delicious sympathy too far; an embodied specimen of his dear Africa, if too near, will make his very flesh creep. We know that "for the cause sake," and "the sake of the whole country," Northern Bishops, and Doctors of Divinity, and Elders, and the smaller fry imitative, have come South, and have taken the "brother" by the hand, actually by the hand, even if his skin was black; and they have had a delightful time with their colored brethren in Conference, and have been, once, sweetly photographed together. But, O, my, what it cost! What a lizard-crawling sensation. Still, the thing looked well, and sounded well—that is at a distance—and, doubtless, would pay well. Besides, was it not a duty? Was there not real christianity in it? "Is he not of the same blood?"

"O, yes, you are all right—don't be measy about it—you haven't done anything wrong—people will understand your motives: nobody will suspect you of being black, and what if they should—are you not engaged in a good work?"

We do not know of any more consummate acting, upon a grand scale, than that of Northern Methodist preachers, who, when at home, in "the Eastern cities," to use Dr. Curry's strong language, "cast out the blacks like dogs," but when here, in the South, feel a tremendous interest in the colored people, too great to suffer any one else to come near them! In the North, according to the same authority, "The black man sojourning among us has verily fallen among thieves." (italics quoted) who have stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead. But these same gentlemen, who at the North acted the part of the "thieves" in the parable, when in the South, personate that of the good Samaritan. We do not know that any stretch of piety ever did require that one and the same person should attempt both these parts.

Which is the serious side of these saintly exotics, the colored man may be unable to decide. We advise him to watch and see whether the Northern Samaritan hinds up, or bleeds, to consult Sam Osborn or Phlebotomy, and to recollect that what they do to the black man at the North, it is barely possible they may do at the South—rob him, or, to use the more elegant expression of Dr. Curry, "exactly fulfill the conditions of the parable." In this city, they are playing the part of Northern Samaritan on a large scale, teaching the colored people theology, and fingering after the neat little sum of $55,000 worth of Southern church property. For selfish ends, worldly and political, the Northern preachers are here interfering between the colored people and their best friends—those who have been raised with them, have cared for them, and who sincerely love them. They studiously separate him from a ministry and church that have brought him to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Christ; a church which the colored man respects; and a ministry with which he at heart affiliates. They are here dividing the colored people against themselves, attacking every congregation where there is any hope of producing difference, and thereby of swelling their paraded statistics. They keep the waters of strife troubled ecclesiastically, socially, and politically. They affect to be zealous for a cause and a people in the South whom they utterly despise and neglect when at home. We conclude by giving the reader the full text of that part of the extract from which we have quoted:

The readiness with which our church in the free states gave up its hold upon the colored people, while in all the South the two races remained in one body, is not hard to explain. White people do not object to the proximity of negroes, if only they are slaves; but free negroes are an abomination. Where slavery rules, white and colored live in the same house, work in the same shop or field, sit side by side in the same seat, and worship in the same church. Emancipate the negro, and he is driven from the house and the workshop; there is no longer a place for him in the church, and no available provision is made for his children in the school. The decadence of slavery in the North, in the absence of any earnest and adequate Christian philanthropy, resulted in the separation of the blacks from the whites, and the casting out of the former, like dogs in Eastern cities, to care for themselves, since they no longer belonged to anybody. In permitting things to take such a course there was most certainly great wrong somewhere, not to say great guilt; and that wrong has been perpetuated among us to the present hour. Our newly aroused zeal for the negro as a freedman ought, however, to call our attention to that part of the same race who dwell in our immediate presence as nominal freemen. Never were the conditions of a parable more exactly fulfilled than in this case. The black man sojourning among us has verily fallen among thieves, who have "stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead." The priest has seen him thus, but "he passed by on the other side," and the Levite looked upon him and passed by also. It remains now for the Church—for our own Methodism, acting the good Samaritan—to bind up his wounds, and to minister to his great necessities.

COODFISH vs. TOBACCO.

It is refreshing to see the irrepressible moralist of the North, having got through with the "sum of all villainies," now turning his serious attention to Tobacco. The reader can see the way they cry mad-dog in those elevated regions; how one starts it, and another takes it up, the tone becoming at each cry louder, deeper, closer, and more conscientious, until the "use of tobacco is pronounced" a "downright sin." We quote the Northern Christian Advocate:

EFFECTS OF THE USE OF TOBACCO ON MENTAL CHARACTER AND INFLUENCE.

"Sanctify yourselves, therefore, and be ye holy, for I am the Lord thy God."

The Rev. Bishop Ames, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, while holding a conference a few months since, expressed his opinion that—

"A very large proportion of the funds which are collected for superannuated preachers is paid to men, who, by the excessive use of tobacco, have mentally and physically disqualified themselves for the itinerant work."

A religious journal, commenting on this remarks:

"Is the body, mind and influence of God's ministers to be sacrificed to this indulgence, and then are the Churches to be called upon to sustain them when laid aside? One whom we have well known and esteemed, and admired for his former piety, his bright and ready conversational powers, is now so engrossed with his pipe that a simple question has to be put to him the second time before his attention can be gained, and he is so irritable, so short, and so indifferent in his reply, and so intent on his smoking, as to put an end to social intercourse, and may it not be said, to study and to active duties?"

Copying the above, a secular paper adds: "The use of tobacco, in our out of the pulpit, stupefies the brain, injures the vision, the hearing, and the voice, blunts the memory, begets dyspepsia, bronchitis, and other throat diseases, paralyzes the energies and brings on premature old age and decay. We question the purity of any man's blood or belief who is an habitual smoker, snuffer, or chewer of tobacco, or drinker of ardent spirits or beer. He certainly is not so perfect a medium between man and his maker, or so perfect a Christian. We read of the 'blind leading the blind,' and if the use of tobacco by the clergyman is not a perversion, yet, downright sin, then we are mistaken. Be it ours to correct, though we may not convert, those wicked sinners who, with pipe and grog, become pensioners, and live on charity."

A reform paper, copying both the above remarks:

"A Wesleyan minister, formerly residing in this city (Syracuse) was so steeped in tobacco that he would soon render the air of a room unfit for breathing. This rendered his pastoral visits many times very unpleasant, and in some cases of sickness, almost unendurable. We cannot but think that the Wesleyans, who are so strenuous in small matters, should at least see to it that their ministers do not render themselves public nuisances by their unclean and intemperate habits. We once sat beside a Scotch Presbyterian minister whose breath emitted the fumes of alcohol so as to endanger intoxication, but we greatly preferred it to the horrid stench emitted by this good Wesleyan, at one time, when kneeling by him in prayer."

Well, we've been dreadfully smoked in our day, and we don't object to this righteous norther if it will bring us a little pure air. But we do not see how a people in the daily and habitual use of codfish can say ought against tobacco. Have they seriously looked into the moral and physical effects of this unnatural diet upon the stomachs, the spirits, the atmosphere of every boarding school in New England? There is a smell of something dead in this repulsive substance that reminds one of the Kytch tribe in Africa, which never kill anything, but grind up the bones of dead animals, and make them into porridge. As for "questioning the purity of any man's blood or belief who is an habitual smoker, snuffer or chewer of tobacco," what has this "secular" man to say of the character and life of one who uses for long years together, strong, unmixed codfish? It is not going too far to say, that the general appetite of all classes in the North for this vicious substance has left its taint upon their morals, manners, literature, church, and aristocracy. We are glad to hear from Bishop Ames; but, while testifying upon Tobacco, let him also tell what he knows of the physical, mental, and ethical habits and condition of the devotees of this artificial preparation. If he will not speak we will. We have known a Bishop who used it to excess at last take to stealing churches—actually bagging several score of them, upon the plea of loyalty—a habit from which he could be with difficulty restrained. Another case, that of a Doctor of Divinity, a regular confish-eater, who stole a large flock of black sheep. Another, that of two Elders, of like habits, who, following in the wake of Gen. Banks, saw a parsonage set on fire and burn to the ground, in which they had lodged and eat, without extending so much as a hand to the rescue of either inmates or furniture. The last case we shall mention is one of a Chaplain "addicted to this indulgence." He was called upon to open his saddlebags, as he passed through Selma, Ala., and outrolled a silver candlestick! let us in charity hope that he was only a Deacon—yes a candlestick, which he had evidently removed out of its place. What shall we say of such a man? Why, "that he is certainly not so perfect a medium between man and his Maker, or so perfect a Christian" as he ought to be. These instances may suffice: though if we were to state all that we know of that kind, what vast numbers of sewing machines, watches, pianos, finger-rings, diamond pins, money, spoons, well-bound books, law-books and prayer-books, cut-glass vases; baby clothes, clocks and grave-stones, and other forms of private property had been taken off by the people of New England, one could almost conceive of them as a nation of codfish-eaters.

Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, who, we believe, has an experience of his own, in every department and upon everything, has not yet spoken out upon this subject. Though he says of Tobacco, "I am proud to say that I never used tobacco. Although in the year just preceding my college days, I did tamper with it a little, I never formed the habit even of smoking. I never was able to smoke a whole cigar, thank God; and I was no sooner able to smoke half of one than I felt that that was enough, and gave up meddling with the vile weed. Ever since then I have been absolutely free from its taint. And every one of my own mother's sons have been of like cleanness. I should be proud if the name might go down without the color or smell of tobacco on it! Now let him unbosom himself and say, if he can, that he is 'clean' from this horrible vice of gorging codfish, and we are with him and the whole 'Beecher family.'"

O, my! how shall one ever keep up with these people! who is sufficient for these things!

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

For sale by Rev. R. J. Harp, Agent, No. 112 Camp street.

THE ALBERT N'YANZA, Great Basin of the Nile, and exploration of the Nile sources, by Samuel White Baker, with maps, illustrations, and portraits. London, Macmillan & Co. J. B. Lippincott & Co. Philadelphia, 1866. 8vo., pp. 509.

Not the least of the achievements of the nineteenth century, is the clearing up of the mystery which has hung over the sources of the Nile.

The problem of ages has been solved by the enterprise of four Englishmen. Bruce, won the source of the Blue Nile; Speke and Grant, by incredible labor, that of the Victoria Source of the White Nile; and Baker has completed the whole, by the discovery of the great reservoir of the equatorial waters, from which the entire White Nile issues a giant at its birth. This book is a continued record of the adventures, dangers, escapes, toilsome progress through mountain and marsh, by water and land, by which the great result was attained. It far surpasses in interest any book of the kind we have ever read. More than that of Livingston or Burton, this Journal bears one on through new regions, and new tribes, and new types of barbarism, surprising even the imagination, and holding the reader breathless for the fate of the illustrious traveler and his noble wife to the very last day's journey. Mr. Baker combined to an unusual degree the man of science, the merchant, the hunter, the sailor, the landman, and the military man, with the rare gift of being able to control men. Accustomed for years to the climate of the East Indies, and remarkable there as a hunter, he was fitted to encounter successfully the tropical heats and fevers of Africa. His powers of endurance were something incredible. It would seem as if any other man might have died several times during that four years' expedition. With all these qualities he could not have succeeded without Mrs. Baker—An English Woman, after the order of Eve: with the love and refinement of a Christian wife, she displayed the courage, the patience, and the devotion that characterizes the highest type of her sex. She has demonstrated what a woman can do, by what she has done.

The Basin of the Nile is included between about the 22nd degree and the 39th degree East Longitude, and from 3 degrees South to 18 degrees North latitude. So that the vast drainage of about 1200 miles square, supports the great Egyptian River.

In this Basin there are two immense lakes, the Victoria Nyanza, and the Albert Nyanza. The one more than a thousand feet higher than the other, and draining into it by the Victoria Nile, or "Somerset River." Then out of the lower lake, the Nile issues. Both these lakes are surrounded by mountains from 5 to 10,000 feet high, which spring upward from their very shores. The whole of this great Nile Basin, Mountains, and all stand upon an elevation of nearly 4000 feet above the sea. The evidences of design in this grand water system, are as remarkable as those in the circulation of the blood. The mountains condense the rainclouds from the ocean, and pour the water down their sides to the lakes, and thence, over the Lybian Desert, through the lands of Egypt, back again to the Mediterranean Sea.

The HOME MONTHLY for February, is at hand, filled with choice matter.

Contents: Gonzalo de Cordora; Sunday and Monday; The New Years Ghost; "St. Elmo;" Immortal Books; Sidney's Bluff; Providence; Did Shakespeare write Shakespeare? Jefferson Davis; Lines to Mrs. Cross; Editorial Department.

LEGISLATURE.

Three important items of internal improvement are before the Legislature. That of the Texas and New Orleans Rail Road. That of deepening the channel of the Mississippi River, and the enlargement of the New Canal. The N. O. Times, says of the latter:

"There is a bill before our Legislature providing for the extension of the lease of the New Canal, with a view to its enlargement. This is a measure of great importance to our commerce, and we hope will be favorably and promptly considered by the General Assembly. The canal and basin are quite too small for the large and increasing trade of which they are the medium. The great advantages of steamboats on our lake and coast trade, can never be fully realized until the canal and basin are enlarged."

Such an improvement would afford great additional facilities to the Alabama and Florida lines of communication to this city.

We notice that Governor Wells recommends the CENTENARY COLLEGE to the favorable consideration of the Assembly. This Institution is one of the oldest and most important in the State. It has educated a number of its prominent citizens. During the war it suffered severely, being alternately in the hands of Federals and Confederates. It answered a fine purpose more than once as a hospital. The buildings, reared at great cost, need immediate repair. The endowment funds of the College suffered greatly by the destruction of Confederate values. There are some seventy pupils in attendance, a number of them State-students. The Trustees having been themselves impoverished, call upon the State for aid to carry out the purposes of their Trust.

RECONSTRUCTION.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5.—The Richmond Examiner publishes the new plan restoration in an authoritative shape. A constitutional amendment is to be adopted which declares all the laws to withdraw from the Union null, that the United States debt is sacred, that the insurrectionary debt shall be forever repudiated, that persons born in the United States shall be citizens thereof, and of the States in which they reside; that representation shall be apportioned among the whole number of people, excluding mixed Indians that there shall be no other suffrage qualification than $250 of taxable property, ability to read the Constitution in English and write one sentence. The State Constitution are to be amended in accordance with the above, except that none be excluded from the franchise who have heretofore exercised it by the proposed restrictions. The Democratic members have not been formally consulted on the new plan, neither has it transpired that the Republicans have made pledges binding them, in case the South adopts it.

There are many chronic honey-combed politicians who were fierce secessionists, and are now equally fierce Union-men. They desire again to fish in the muddy waters at Washington; To be seen as bubbles for an instant upon the surface, and scum of that boiling caldron. We fear such men will hurry our States of the South into action, unworthy a free people. There can be no advantage at present, in having admission or voice in the halls of Congress. Helpless, the South, would sit there a spectacle to men and angels—by the presence of its Representatives endorsing the violent and lawless measures, which aim at a subversion of the Federal Constitution, and the destruction of the Executive, and the Judiciary Departments. The South is getting along well enough, and honorably enough as it is. Let her husband the great natural resources in her possession: part with none of them. Let her keep her lands, which in all other countries constitute the most desirable wealth, for her children, and not exchange them for Greenbacks, which, in comparison therewith, are as the morning dew. We need no capital in addition to that which we have. Our towns are springing up with the vigor of the grasses of the Prairie in the track of a fire. Our large cities, have evidently started in the race of competition with those of the North, and must outstrip them, relieved as they are from the incubus of an hundred years. Fictitious, are going up, Coal and Iron mines in the great Basin of the tributaries to the Gulf, are being opened. Let New England make all she can, and find out for the first time that she has been supported upon a naked rock for a century, by the toil of the slave, and that she, not the South, will be able to measure the full import of the recent war between the States, and the Emancipation incident thereto. The State governments as we now have them, answer all purposes of civil life. Even to entertain a proposition from Congress for reconstruction, while our Representatives are refused admittance, would evidence a want, equally of State-fidelity and State-wisdom.

PERSONAL.

Bishop H. N. McTear.—A note from our beloved Bishop states that he and family are snugly fixed in their home at Nashville, Tennessee. They occupy the Episcopal Parsonage which many years ago was presented to the church by H. R. W. Hill. Correspondents will please take notice that henceforth Nashville, Tenn., is the Bishop's address.

THE REV. J. ATKINS, of the Holston Conference, passed through the city this week. He has been traveling for some months, in search of health. We were sorry to hear from him that he had not yet sufficiently recovered to preach.

THE JACKSON METHODIST.—We are sorry to see the Editor wasting his precious powder upon us. Very unprofitable that sort of firing; the recoil is severely more than the shot. If he can stand it, we can.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

On our last page will be found the card of Messrs. Jennings, Wicks & Co., Cotton Factors, and Commission Merchants, 39 Perdido street. These gentlemen opened their house in this city during the past year. They have been long and most favorably known as merchants in St. Louis and in Memphis.

FROM OTHER CHURCHES.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, NORTH.
BIDDING FOR POWER.

From an exchange we gather the following details of a new church now being completed in the National Capitol: "It will be built of brown stone, in the Gothic order, and will be surmounted by a spire 220 feet high, and will seat about 2000 persons. The Vestibule is to be laid in mosaic, all the wood work to be of black walnut and white ash—the beams and girders of yellow pine. In the arrangement of seats, the national character of the church will be pleasingly carried out. Pews will be set apart for the President and his Cabinet, the Judges of Courts, and Officers of the Army and Navy. Seats will also be provided for the different States, bearing on their panels the coat of arms belonging to each. Upwards of one hundred thousand dollars is the estimated cost. Chief Justice Chase, Senator Horlan, and Gen. Grant, are members of Board of Trustees."

The Western Advocate says that Peter Cartwright, though now in his eighty-third year, travels an extensive district; attending all his quarterly meetings, preaching with accessibility, attracting large congregations, and performing the duties of his office with far greater efficiency than many a preacher who is half a century younger.

AMERICAN WESTERN METHODIST.

The Christian Advocate publishes a call for a meeting of the chief ministers and laymen of this body, to consider the propriety of a formal dissolution, with the intention of a return of its members to the Methodist Episcopal Church. These brethren strongly assert the rectitude of their action in going out from the old Church, and now claim that since the cause of their separation has ceased, there is no longer any reason why they should not return.

EPISCOPAL.

The Fairfax Theological Seminary near Alexandria, (Va.), has been presented with the sum of ten thousand dollars, together with the interest on the same for several years, by A. G. P. Dodge, Esq., of Elizabethtown, New Jersey.

St. Paul's Episcopal parish, in Petersburg, (Va.), is to have a free school, to be supported at the expense of the parishioners. This school is to be opened at regular hours, in the basement of the church, and the exercise will comprise instruction in all the useful English branches, besides the moral training equally indispensable to the successful battling with the world. An accomplished lady has been secured as principal, and she will be assisted by a corps of volunteers from the young ladies of the church, five of whom will attend daily for a week at a time.

BAPTIST.

BAPTIST VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.—Dr. N. M. Crawford, known as an able Baptist minister, advises the Bible Union to sell no more of these miscellaneously corrected revisions, to fall back on the common version, and before they publish another revision, appoint on the Final Committee some man who knows English, and give him an absolute veto in all proposed alterations.

CITY NEWS.

SPEECH OF THE HON. MR. VOORHIES.

The Hall of the House of representatives was, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, crowded, last evening, to the utmost extent of its capacity, by a large assemblage of citizens, including many ladies, whom the fame and well known patriotism of this distinguished orator of the West attracted thither, and whose raised expectations were fully gratified by one of the most brilliant, appropriate and eloquent addresses which it has been our good fortune to hear. He touched briefly on all the important and exciting political topics of the day; the administration of President Johnson, whom he applauded for his unshrinking championship of the Constitution and his untiring devotion to the interests of the country, particularly those of the South, in this hour of her peril; on the confidence to be reposed in that impregnable bulwark of constitutional liberty, the Supreme Court of the United States, and on the Conservative party of the United States, North and South, constituting, he declared at the present moment, an overwhelming majority of the votes of the United States. He asserted that the governing party at this critical period was unquestionably in a minority, though embracing the representative in Congress and that portion of American citizens who supported their measures, and dwelt on the significant fact that the Conservative party were in the ascendancy, as a ground of reliable hope for the ultimate restoration of the South to her rights. Sooner or later this party would crumble to pieces and be despoiled to the elements, before the conquering force of public opinion.

He alluded to the effort made since the conclusion of the war to reduce the Southern State—which were regarded and treated as States by the Federal Government through the entire pendency of the struggle—to the condition of territories, and demonstrated the inconsistency, as well as folly, of making such an attempt at the very moment when Congress was submitting for their ratification an amendment of the Federal Constitution, which distinctly recognized their existence as independent States, forming portions of the Union, and in all respects qualified to act as such. He subjected the details of that amendment to a rigid examination, and made a most scathing exposure of its iniquitous provisions, declaring that its ratification by any Southern State would be tantamount to a surrender of the right of representation, and all the principles of a republican government, and would cover such State with eternal disgrace. He maintained that the Southern States had lost none of their rights by the war, and that Louisiana was at this moment, the peer, in all respects, of any other State in the Union.

He stated that the doctrine of universal suffrage, recently insisted on by the Radical party, for the purpose of elevating an inferior to the status of a superior race, would, when public sentiment on the subject was challenged, meet no responsive approval from the great mass of the Northern people. He inveighed stoutly against the recent passage of the tariff, designating it as a bill of abominations, but yet a bill which would have a tendency to bind together in indissoluble bonds the agricultural interests of the West and the Southwest, and to harmonize and consolidate, as they never had done before, the relations of these two sections.

In reference to the evils which the South now endured, and the perils with which she was threatened, he said the remedies, and the only ones that could now be suggested were time and patience.

The speech of the Hon. Mr. Voorhies often electrified the audience, eliciting spontaneous bursts of applause, and will long be remembered for the high attributes of eloquence by which it was distinguished. A full report of it will be found in another column.

LATEST NEWS.

[Special to the N. O. Times.]

The New Plan of Reconstruction.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 8.—It has transpired that a portion of the Judiciary Committee has been at work for some time, secretly taking testimony against the President, Judge Hiestand, R. King Cutler, W. R. Fish, Gen. Butler, Gen. Banks, and others familiar with New Orleans affairs, have been sworn and testified before Bontwell, Williams and Wilson in the star chamber investigation, other members of the committee not being permitted to know what was going on.

The results of this investigation is to be laid before the Radical caucus, and if the caucus agrees, a formal investigation is to be prosecuted before the whole committee.

Military Governments.

Congress, Feb. 7.—After some unimportant business, the Reconstruction Committee bill was taken up. Stevens had not made up his mind beyond desiring a vote as early as possible. He would not agree to postpone the vote until Monday. Le Blond said the bill struck down civil government in the South, ignored State lines and broke down the Judiciary. Raymond proposed, in view of its importance, to allow twenty minutes. It was finally agreed to hold a night session for discussion. J. W. Ashley rose to a personal explanation regarding the newspaper correspondence, in which he took occasion to denounce the President, but denied complicity with Gen. Butler or intention to stab Gen. Grant in the back.

The Retrenchment Committee have reported favorably on the official conduct of Mr. Van Dyke, the Assistant Treasurer at New York.

Stevens and Brandtger made characteristic speeches in favor of the new Reconstruction bill. The latter said the bill commences where Gen. Grant left off two years ago. He saw promise that the sword of the Republic was about to be again unsheathed. Le Blond and Finch opposed it. Pike favored it, Farnsworth following the same side, Rogers spoke an hour in opposition, saying rather than see military government established in this country he for one would use the power the Almighty gave him in resisting an invasion of her liberties. Thayer interrupted Rogers continued: If the South had the blood of Washington, Jefferson and Madison, of the sages and heroes of the revolution, they would protest, as their fathers protested, by their blood against the despotism of King George. He hoped the President of the United States would resist and would use the powers the Constitution gave him, to compel traitors to obey the laws. If Andrew Johnson, added Rogers, would submit to see the country destroyed, his name would go down with ignominy to posterity as a coward and traitor.

Bingham spoke very briefly, placing himself squarely in opposition to the measure, when the House took a recess till 7 o'clock.

Several speeches were made for and against the new bill, and this body adjourned at 10 o'clock.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7.—Mr. Ashley today, in the House, rose to a personal explanation, denying the truth of the charges of the correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial that Gen. Grant was aimed at conjointly with President Johnson in the impeachment resolution. He did not attempt to explain the charge that fifty thousand dollars was paid him as an incentive to offering the resolution.

Stevens's Military Government bill was taken up today and discussed throughout the session. There is to be an adjourned session this evening on the same topic.

Stevens will move the previous question at two P. M. to-morrow. It is understood to-night that the Bingham faction has agreed to support this bill, in which case it will have a full party vote and pass by more than two-thirds.

Its reception in the Senate will doubtless be altogether different.

Invitations sent to-day for State dinner, next Tuesday, were accepted by all the Radicals who received them. The list includes about twenty members of the House.

The Senate having refused to concur in the House amendment to the Tenure of Office bill, including Cabinet Ministers, among those who may not be deposed without consent of the Senate, there is a strong probability that the bill will fail.

The friends of the Bankrupt bill are confident of its passage. They will move to reconsider the vote by which it was defeated as soon as two or three of its friends, now absent, return.

The Eastern Question.

The Cretan war has been renewed. The terms of the Sublime Porte for peace were scornfully rejected by the Cretans. A battle has since been fought, but the result is not stated. There was apparently much enthusiasm on both sides, and the war had spread to the neighboring islands.

It is believed that the complications arising out of the Cretan war and the movements in Roumania, will result in a general conflict. Turkey has called out 150,000 reserves. The Government of Russia has ordered that all military furloughs shall end on the 1st of March. The Greek Ministry propose to raise the effective force of the army to 31,000 men, including 14,000 reserves, which action is taken on account of the military preparations made and the threatening attitude taken by the Sublime Porte.

OBITUARIES.

Capt. ISAAC A. HOMER, was born Oct. 26, A. D., 1823, in Boston, Massachusetts, and his parents, Capt. A. B. and Phebe Homer, moved to Mobile, Ala., in 1828, when he was about 5 years old. He remained here until 1857, when he went to St. Marx, Florida, where he was married to Miss Mattie Coleman. He remained in St. Marx, until the tiffin of war was sounded, when he responded nobly to the call of his country, and shouldered his arms in the defense of Southern Independence. Having enlisted as a "Confederate soldier," he was determined to share the fate of his country. He was with the "Army of Virginia," during the three first years of the war, when he was detached to go as "Pilot in the service of the Navy," where he served faithfully his country, until the close of the war; when he engaged to carry some persons to China, but when out upon the ocean, they were captured, and he was taken to Fort Jackson, and placed in prison for a short time, and taken to Fort Lafayette, and confined in a dungeon for some months, and here he took cold, which settled on his lungs, turned to consumption, which terminated in his death on the 13th of Dec. 1866, at his father's residence, on Eastern Shore, Baldwin Co., Ala.

When released from prison, he came to St. Marx, where he had many warm friends; but learning from his physician, that his disease must prove fatal, he started to the house of his parents, having lost his wife and child while he was in the army. He desired to die at home, where he could have the care of a mother, when called to pass the cold stream of death. He said to his mother soon after he reached home, that "he came home to die." He talked much of death, and had no fear of Eternity, but only feared from the peculiar nature of his disease, that he must strangle to death, and requested "that when his end was near, that his physician should give him something to make him die easy." We related him to Christ, as his all-sufficient Saviour, and assured him that dying grace would be given; and true it was, for I never saw any one die so easy. On the morning of his death, he said to his mother, that he was fast sinking, but that he would soon meet his wife and child in Heaven. When he had breathed his last, the mother, called "Isaac, my son, Isaac are you dead; No, my child sleeps in Jesus." He was faithful in all the relations of life. As a child, obedient; as a husband, devoted; and as a citizen, faithful; but his spirit has gone to rest with the saints.

His body sweetly sleeps in the dust, but his spirit has gone to rest with the ransomed and redeemed of the Lord.

An officer who was in the service with him, says: "that he was universally loved by all his comrades. And now that he has passed away, we sorrow not as those who have no hope, but feel that he sleeps in Jesus," and they that sleep in Jesus, will God bring with him. Our loss in his eternal gain; and to weeping parents, brothers, sisters, and friends, be assured "that though he cannot come back to us, yet we can go to him."

AND BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE (Tory.)

These foreign periodicals are regularly published by us in the same style as heretofore. Those who know them and who have long subscribed to them, need no reminder; those whom the civil war of the last few years has deprived of their once welcome supply of the best periodical literature, will be glad to have them again within their reach; and those who have never yet have met with them, will assuredly be well pleased to receive accredited reports of the progress of European science and literature.

NEW SOUTHERN MUSIC BOOK.

Just published

TABOR;

Or the Richmond Collection of Sacred Music.

By R. MCINTOSH, of Virginia.

The attention of Chorus and Musical Societies generally is respectfully asked for this new and popular collection of Church Music. Its author for four years an officer in the Confederate Army composed many pieces in moments snatched during his marching and counter-marching. The dirge at the funeral of Gen. T. J. Jackson (Stonewall) May 17, 1863, was from his pen, and is included in this collection.

Says the Richmond Virgin: "The writer is well known throughout the South as an author of finished excellence; a musical reputation rarely attained—at the head of Church Music, no one disputing the position with him, and besides is, and ever has been, one of us."

Says the Spartanburg (S. C.) Express: "After a careful examination of TABOR, we have no hesitation in pronouncing it a Musical Gem. Its original compositions give the work a distinctive character, while the selections embrace those good old tunes which have come down from our fathers as an invaluable legacy. Here, too, may be found a number of traditional melodies, which, for half a century or more, have been sung throughout the South and Southwest, and never before in print. We can heartily recommend it to Churches, Chorus, and all lovers of Sacred Music."

It has been largely introduced and highly recommended by many of the Churches in Richmond and Petersburg, where the author is best known. It embraces all the metres in use, in every key and variety of measure, with a full elementary department and the collection of new authors, set pieces, and sentences. It contains nearly 300 closely printed pages, neatly and tastefully gotten up, well priced and bound. Price—single, $1 25; 12 00 per dozen.

Can be obtained through all booksellers, or will be mailed by the Publishers to any of the United States, post free, on receipt of retail price.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

Since the publication of our last issue the general market has exhibited a fair degree of animation, and several of the leading articles have undergone a notable variation. Sugar and Molasses have been in demand, at higher prices, and Western Produce has disclosed its usual vitality, attended with an easier feeling in Corn and Flour, and a decline in Pork, while the movement in our leading staple has evinced considerable activity, although to realize, factors, under continued heavy receipts, and further depression at New York and Liverpool, have been obliged to make additional concessions, the market closing yesterday at our quotations, with a softening tendency.

COTTON—On Saturday, notwithstanding holders showed increased anxiety to sell, and evinced a disposition in most instances to make concessions, still the movement continued light throughout, the sales at the close comprising barely 3000 bales, at prices $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢ lower. On Monday there was a more liberal inquiry, and as most sellers were willing to meet the demand at the ruling rates, quite a heavy business was transacted, the day's transactions footing up 7400 bales, at previous prices. Yesterday the market opened under the unfavorable influence of a decline at Liverpool, and although the majority of holders evinced a disposition to accept easier prices, yet buyers generally held aloof, and consequently the sales were less liberal, footing up at the close barely 5400 bales at softer rates, the market closing with a tendency to inside figures.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 13,003 bales, against 18,146 during the corresponding period last week, showing an decrease of 5143 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 485,482 bales, against 442,809 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 74,076 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 93,883 bales to Great Britain, of 17,928 to France, and an increase of 10,902 bales to other foreign ports.

TOBACCO—Continues in request, but the stock is too small for important operations. The sales have been small since our last review. The receipts since the first of January have been only about 100 hhds, which were sold readily. A number of foreign buyers are in the market, awaiting receipts from the West, and supplies would meet with good and advantageous sale. We repeat our quotations for reference, although they are said to be inside prices:

	Light.	Heavy.
Low Refused	2 3/4	3 1/4
Good do	4 1/4	4 3/4
Common Leaf	5 1/4	5 3/4
Fair	6 1/4	6 3/4
Good	7 1/4	7 3/4
Choice	8 1/4	8 3/4
Choice Select	9 1/4	9 3/4

WHEAT—The stock is light, but the demand is only of a retail character. About 4500 barrels were sold in small lots, on Saturday and Monday, at $1.50 for Common, $1.11 to $1.15 for Fine, $1.17 to $1.21 for Superfine, $1.22 to $1.25 for Single Extra, $1.25 to $1.30 for Double Extra, $1.34 to $1.40 for Treble Extra, and $1.50 to $1.60 for Choice Extra. Yesterday the market was inactive and prices were dropping owing to better supplies being expected.

Monetary.

The movement in Coin has been unusually light, although rates, sympathizing with the course of prices at New York, have disclosed a marked improvement. Gold opened on Saturday at 136 $\frac{1}{2}$, but subsequently advanced and closed firm at 136 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 136 $\frac{3}{4}$; it opened on Monday at 136 to 136 $\frac{1}{2}$, and without exhibiting any material irregularity, closed steady at 136 $\frac{1}{2}$, and opened yesterday at 137 to 137 $\frac{1}{2}$, advancing later in the day and closing firm at 138.

CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE

ORGAN OF THE M. E. CHURCH SOUTH FOR THE MOBILE, MONTGOMERY, MISSISSIPPI AND LOUISIANA CONFERENCES

VOLUME XIII.—NUMBER 5.
WHOLE NUMBER 614.

NEW ORLEANS, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1867.

($3.00 A YEAR IN ADVANCE.
OFFICE—112 CAMP STREET.

LOVE'S WORDS.

A little hand with golden hair,
A little face so sweet and fair,
A little hand with its dimpled grace,
It wanders lovingly over my face,
And a sweet voice whispers soft and low,
"I love you sister—I love you so."

It is dreary outside—the wind and rain
Sweep sobbing by, like a funeral train;
But there's light within—my heart beats high,
I heed not the wild wind's wailing cry,
As I list to the murmur soft and low,
"I love you sister—I love you so."

Where there comes no storm with its blither blight,
Where many hearts we have missed below,
Are murmuring still, "We love you so."

THE SABBATH.

Fresh glides the brook and blows the gale,
Yet yonder halts the quiet mill.
The whirling wheel, the rushing mill—
How motionless and still.

Six days of toil, poor child of Cain,
Thy strength the slave of want may be;
The seventh thy limbs escape the chain—
A God hath made thee free!

Ah, tender was the law that gave
This holy respite to the breast—
To breathe the gale, to watch the wave,
And know the wheel may rest!

But where the waves the gentlest glide,
With image charms to light thine eyes?
The spirit reflected on the tide,
Inspires thee to the skies.

To teach the soul its noble worth
The rest from mortal toil is given;
Go snatch the brief reprieve from earth,
And pass—a guest to heaven.

LITTLE GRAVE.

Dear little grave bestrewn with flowers,
God's smile thy tears—our tears thy showers;
I come to claim of thee a part,
And o'er thee bend a yearning heart.

I come and kneel, with upraised eyes,
While on my lips each murmur dies,
As faith beholds, beyond the skies,
The bud, whose seed within thee lies!

Dear little grave thou dost enshrine
The treasure that we thee consign
To keep for us until the day
When soaring soul shall claim its clay.

Thou hidest no woe, sweet little bed,
For well we know through thee Christ led
Our spotless lamb from earth's dark world
To light and love in his dear fold—
Where when made pure as the child,
Again may elapse those undimmed.

THE FUNDAMENTAL TRUTHS OF CHRISTIANITY.

From the German, by Prof. J. B. A. AUBREY.

THE HISTORY OF REVELATION.

Revelation is subject to the law of development. Unlike the novel origin of the heathen goddess, Minerva, did the Christian Revelation attain to its manifest perfectness step by step—she has a history. Now, history is concerned with progress; but progress is possible only when a fixed goal is to be reached. This goal is the kingdom of God—the realization of the moral and religious ideal. Every nation has had its special destiny in the sum of the world's history. There were nations of culture: Greece and Rome. There was a nation whose destiny it was to propagate true religion: this was Israel. But both, culture and religion, must go hand in hand. Christianity accomplishes this.

The nations of heathenism were not without religion. But their religion was a mere natural religion, a religion of the senses, and almost invariably served the cause of immorality. Their religion was not without truth; but, inasmuch as error preponderated, even that truth was buried with the error in the universal grave of dissolution. Unbelief and superstition—pernicious sprouts of the dead trunk—do indeed continue to infest mankind. But, they too, must die before the sun of Revelation.

Socrates has often been compared with Christ. But what a world-wide difference exists between them! Socrates was not a man of the world, but simply a man of his nation. Nor was Plato anything else but a Greek—a Greek philosopher. Their efforts to benefit mankind were bounded by the boundaries of Greece. The best morals taught in antiquity were those of the stoics. But, even with them the heart is chilled with the desperate and proud spirit of resignation. Throughout the various systems of heathenism we find that man—his being, and destiny—that man was not known. Eternal love came to his rescue.

Everywhere in the heathen world, among the Persians, Indians, Greeks, the old Germans, etc. etc., we find traces of an old and universal belief, that in some future time, when corruption should have reached its zenith, the iron age of sin and misery should cease. To this end, a divine Prince was expected to descend from heaven. He was to restore Arcadian innocence and bliss. All sacrifices, all prayers, all religious rites, and ceremonies of heathenism are the forebodings of the approaching truth.

From the heathen we turn to the Jews. A beautiful oasis, these people appear in the midst of the vast wilderness of error. They were the stewards of our Revelation. Three cardinal thoughts governed the religious life of the Jews. The first is God; the second, is sin, through the law and sacrifices constantly kept awake, and the third is that of the promised Savior, by all the prophets precisely portrayed, and which was realized in the advent of Christ, the son of Mary. Christianity has not entered the world as a new philosophy, or a new system of ethics, but as a historical fact—a fact radiating from Christ.

JESUS CHRIST.

No other question receives in our day more attention than that relating to the person of the Lord. And justly so; for the solution of that question solves at the same time that of Christianity. From his birth He received divine homage. But, with all that, we discover at an early date much opposition to the doctrine of the Savior's divinity. The Jewish error recognized in Christ a mere prophet; while the errors of the heathen, did indeed discover in Him a supernatural being, but shrouded His historical realization with the mists of mythology. The church found in Christ, both, God and man.

Rationalism denies the Lord's divinity. With it, Christ is simply a symbol of divine wisdom, etc. From this stand-point, argues Strauss; that the history of the Gospels was a wreath of myths, which owed their origin to the poetical genius of the early Christians. But how? when Christ who is portrayed in the Gospels, is the poetical fabrication of the early Christians, whose fabrication then are these Christians?

Much, has of late the idea found place in the republic of letters, that, after all, the authenticity of the Gospel record was not so well founded. But, was then this record accidentally found in some library, that thus there might be doubt with regard to its origin? Were not the Gospels from the beginning open documents, composed and distributed under the zealous supervising eye of the Church? They were publicly read in the early Christian congregations. And were these congregations easily to be imposed upon, when for their religious convictions they readily died the grim death of the martyr?

Independent of all other proofs for the authenticity of the Gospels, we shall simply make mention of one—the portrait of Jesus Christ. The delineations of the Savior's character could not have been invented, and they must be the copy of the original. Man could not portray a sinless, holy character like that of Christ, without sketching lineaments, which betrayed the authorship. Was not the Jews ideal, the direct opposite from that which Christ actually was? Had the Jews, without the true original, in the Gospels portrayed the Savior, we would have the picture of some mighty prince and learned scribe, and not that of a carpenter's son.

In order to invalidate the authenticity of the Gospel's has Baur spent nearly all his fine mental powers, to prove that they were composed in the second century, and, consequently, after all the disciples of Christ had been dead. We have literary works composed in the second century. And, certainly, the strictest criticism must decide that in point of language—language which in every century has its marked peculiarity, that there is a vast difference between those writings and the Gospel record.

With this we close the series of interesting papers on "The Fundamental Truths of Christianity." We may here state that they are not a mere translation of the original work by the renowned doctor of theology, E. E. Luthard, at the university of Leipzig, but an imperfect synopsis of the same. It is only two years since the work first appeared in print, and already it has realized five heavy editions in Germany, and has been translated into eight different tongues. A complete translation will appear in New York very shortly.

FROM OTHER CHURCHES.

NORTHERN METHODIST.

DR. WHEDON IN ADVANCE.—"Did sufficient reasons require a well-qualified African-American bishop to be elected, and preside in turn over our General Conference, who would object from mere color alone? A few years ago the objection, in obedience to southern influences, would have been very unanimous. A few years hence, we trust, it will be wondered that such objection could ever have existed."—Methodist Quarterly Review.

EPISCOPAL.

HIGH AND LOW CHURCH IN NEW YORK.—The High and Low Church contest continues to be waged with vigor in the diocese of New York, though, of course, in a spirit of Christian charity and forbearance. The former party are trying to have Long Island erected into a separate diocese, and agitated the subject energetically at the meeting of the Convention. On the first day of that meeting, we are informed, by the way, through the New York Church Union—organ of the Low party—that there was "a procession, a la Popish, headed by 'the Bishop of New York,' and some forty surpliced boys, chanting after the most approved Papal methods, as they entered the church." We are also told by the same journal, that the rector of Old Trinity "has introduced the 'Processional Hymn,' with bowings and crossings before the altar, as another step toward Rome." The Union further insinuates the following piquant morsel of scandal: "It is said that $4,000 was offered by a certain, or it seems an uncertain individual, to endow the future diocese, if Dr. Littlejohn were made Bishop. Surely, this question at last was settled, that, while thirty pieces of silver was the price of the suffering One, $40,000 is the price of a modern Bishop. Walpole said every man had his price."

PRESBYTERIAN.

NEW-SCHOOL PRESBYTERIAN.—The Minutes for the year ending in May last, show the whole number of churches in our connection to be 1528; they show the members of the different Churches to range from 3 to more than 1,000 persons. A classification will show the relative strength of the Churches in a pretty clear way, and sufficiently exact for practical purposes. The following table is compiled from the last Minutes:

The Ch's having from 3 to 5 members are 19	" " " 6 to 10 " 41	" " " 11 to 25 " 212	" " " 26 to 50 " 322	" " " 51 to 75 " 217	" " " 76 to 100 " 153	" " " 101 to 150 " 177	" " " 151 & upwards " 350
--	--------------------	----------------------	----------------------	----------------------	-----------------------	------------------------	---------------------------

From this tabular view it can be seen that 1,001 Churches, (nearly two-thirds of the whole number,) have a membership not exceeding in each Church 100 persons. It can also be seen that 842 Churches, (more than half of the whole number) have each not over 25 members; that 631 Churches, (considerably more than a third part of the whole number,) have each not over 50 members; and that 309 Churches have each not over 25 members.

The Synods of Albany, Utica, Onondaga, Geneva, Susquehanna, Genesee, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, are east of the Alleghany Mountains and north of Virginia. They comprise 694 Churches; and 360 of them, as to members, range as follows, viz:

15 Ch's have each from 4 to 10 members.	59 " " 11 to 25 " 59	107 " " 26 to 50 " 97	79 " " 51 to 75 " 79	79 " " 76 to 100 " 79
---	----------------------	-----------------------	----------------------	-----------------------

The remaining 334 Churches have upwards of 100 members. Thus it appears that more than half of the Churches in the above named Synods do not severally exceed 100 members; and more than a quarter of them have each not over 50 members; and 74 of them individually, do not exceed 25 members.

FOREIGN.

MOVEMENT FOR INCREASE OF PREACHERS' SALARIES.—We see it stated in our exchanges that on a recent occasion an influential public meeting of members and friends of the Church of Scotland was held in the Merchant's Hall, Glasgow, for the purpose of forming an Association for augmenting the smaller livings of the clergy. Lord Belhaven occupied the chair, part being taken in the proceedings by Sir James Campbell, the Rev. Dr. Cook, (Moderator of the General Assembly,) Mr. Campbell Swinton, the Rev. Dr. Lee, (of Edinburgh,) the Hon. Major Baillie the Rev. Mr. Charteris, and others. The first resolution which was adopted set forth that the inadequacy of the incomes attached to many of the parochial charges of the Church of Scotland was injurious to the interests of religion and the Church, and that there was an imperative call for efforts being made by all members and friends of the Church for the augmentation of the smaller stipends. Following up this resolution, it was next resolved that an Association should be at once formed, principally composed of the laity, its leading object being to augment such livings of parish ministers as do not amount to $1,000 per annum. The operations of the association are intended to extend over the whole of Scotland, with Glasgow for its centre. A General Committee was afterwards appointed.—United Presbyterian.

NOWHERE WANTED.—Since the cessation of the Austrian rule in Venetia, and its annexation to Italy, the Jesuits have been compelled to leave it, and are settling in great numbers in Bohemia and the Tyrol, though they are not welcome in either country. The city of Prague petitioned that they might not be permitted to settle there, and the Council of Vienna strongly protested against their residence in the capital of Austria, "as well on grounds of conviction, as from motives of policy deeply affecting the empire." Their presence is dreaded not only in these chief cities of the most Catholic country, but they are banished from nearly all Germany, they are not allowed to enter Spain, and their quarters in Europe are narrowing every day. Nor do we feel at all anxious to have them here, unless there are more conservative than history has exhibited them.

THE FRENCH PROTESTANTS AND THE TAHITIAN MISSION.—It is interesting to know that the work of the London Missionary Society, so grievously affected by the French occupation of Tahiti, is now energetically carried forward by an agency from the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society. At the present time there are in Tahiti and its dependencies 37 native Protestant parishes, 1507 pupils in schools, and 3346 communicants in native Protestant churches. Queen Pomare and nearly all her people still adhere to their faith in the gospel. A decree making the teaching of the French language in the native schools compulsory, has been revoked; and the native teachers, who were ignorant of French and who were therefore compelled to resign while the order was enforced, have thereby regained possession of the schools. In January, 1863 a society for the furtherance of primary knowledge among the Protestant schools in the French Protectorate was founded at the residence of Queen Pomare. The Queen's husband is the president of the committee, and Rev. Thomas Arbousset the vice-president.

We have more than once referred in our columns to an individual who has made his appearance in England, claiming to be an "Eastern Bishop," and who has been received with great enthusiasm by the High-Church party. The following curious communication concerning this individual appears in the Guardian:

"I have reason to believe that the English public will soon know a good deal more than it knows at present of the self-styled 'Bishop of Iona.' Meanwhile his friends in England may possibly feel interested in the following facts, which I have learned from an undoubted authority. M. Ferrette was educated at the Propaganda at Rome, where he also received ordination as priest. He had sufficient interest, for he is related to the Pope, to get appointed to a post of some responsibility—I believe that of prior—in a Dominican convent at Mosul, in Asiatic Turkey. He left the convent, however, and also the Church of Rome—with the view, no doubt, of promoting more effectively the reunion of Christendom. Full of this high purpose, it was natural, of course, that he should seek out some man of influence and note who yearned, like himself, for the fair vision of a reunited Christendom, and who had labored long and zealously to sow peace on earth and good will among men. Accordingly M. Ferrette betook himself to Bishop Gobat, and offered his services. The fame of having converted a Dominican Prior would have made Bishop Gobat immortal at Exeter Hall. Nevertheless Bishop Gobat declined the services of the Dominican ex-Prior of Mosul. Upon this, M. Ferrette lost all faith in Episcopacy as an agent in the reunion of Christendom. So he offered himself to the Irish Presbyterian Mission in Damascus, and was employed. Soon after this the Anglo-French Commission, at the head of which was Lord Dufferin, went out to Syria in connection with the massacres. M. Ferrette being a good linguist, and having some knowledge of Syria, was employed on various occasions by the Commission. This gave a new direction to his views on reunion, and with the prospect of fulfilling at last the pious dream of his boyhood and the animating hope of his manhood, he announced his intention of giving up Presbyterianism, and forthwith applied for a Consularship. Unfortunately, the Foreign Office did not appreciate the spiritual significance of the application; and M. Ferrette lost, therefore, the opportunity of making a British Consularship the instrument of reuniting Christendom. Disheartened and nonplussed, he came to England, and your readers know pretty well his history since. Now for the Metropolitan of the World, who is Peter the Humble? He holds office—that of bishop, I believe—in the Syrian Jacobite Church. He ceased to belong to that Church some years ago, and made a journey to Paris, where, and also among the Europeans in Syria, he collected a good deal of money for the 'United Syrian Church,' of which he is 'Metropolitan.' His labors, however, can not be very arduous, for the 'United Syrian Church,' consists of precisely one member, and that member is 'Peter the Humble,' just as the 'Orthodox Western Church,' which is presided over by the 'Bishop of Iona,' consists only of a single member—M. Ferrette. I hope the friends of M. Ferrette will be gratified by this epitome of the histories of the 'Bishop of Iona' and his consecrator, 'Peter the Humble.'"

"M. MacColl."

DIAGNOSIS.

We quote the sensible opinion of one, "who has seen some practice," upon the Pathology of Congressional Legislation:

In our country we have to report that the public mind of the North is quietly settling down to the expectation that Congress will carry out its purpose of assuming the executive government of the country. The President will be impeached and removed. The Supreme Court is already undergoing necessary reduction, and in a few months all the boasted checks and balances of that monument of wisdom, as we used to call the Constitution, will be swept away as quietly as a housemaid wipes down the ingenious web that a wise spider had with wonderful success drawn out of his bowels. Let us take it quietly. Nothing but the practical evils demonstrated by experiment ever heget reaction against the passionate theories of a party bewildered in "the chaos of unanimity." But sweating follows fever, and commonly puts and end to it—and there will be great sweating after a while.—Balt. Epis. Meth.

How THE JESUITS FARE IN AUSTRIA.—While the Pope was celebrating the last services of the year in the church of the Jesuits at Rome, an unusual place for him to be found in, the Jesuits themselves, many of whom were compelled to flee from Rome through fear that, upon the departure of the French, the wrath of the populace would break out against them, have been faring rather hard, even in the Roman Catholic countries to which they have gone. Austria, until lately, has been regarded as the safest asylum for members of the order, but the times have changed. Jesuit fathers who had migrated to Austria, did not have a very cordial reception. At Vienna the municipal council boldly and unanimously declared that they would resist the intrusion of the Jesuits by every lawful means. The inhabitants of one part of Bohemia also sent a number of deputations to the government, to declare that, if the Jesuits pitched their tents among them, they would abandon Roman Catholicism, en masse.

The Jesuits are now pretty well known, the world over, as the enemies of all liberty, and the enemies of the people; and they are likely to receive their deserts.

A GOLGOTHA OF CIVILIZATION.—A more terrible spectacle, says the "National Intelligencer," can hardly be conceived than is to be seen within a dozen yards of Arlington mansion. A circular pit, twenty feet deep and the same in diameter, has been sunk by the side of the flower garden, cemented and divided into compartments, and down into this gloomy receptacle are cast the bones of such soldiers as are perished on the field, and either were not buried at all, or were so covered up as to have their bones mingled indiscriminately together. At the time we looked into this gloomy cavern, a literal Golgotha, there were piled together skulls in one division, legs in another, arms in another, and ribs in another, what were estimated as the bones of two thousand human beings.

LUTHERAN.—The Lutheran Church of this country has developed high church tendencies, similar, somewhat, to that which is so general in the English Episcopal. Some ten synods, representing over one hundred and seventy thousand communicants, formally withdrew from the General Synod at its meeting in June, and last month organized another General Synod, on the basis of a more marked ritualism, and especially of a strict adherence to the Augsburg Confession, with its doctrine of the real presence. The Lutheran, ably edited by Dr. Krauth, is their organ. The Lutheran Observer, now removed to Philadelphia, is the organ of the evangelical party, still strong in all denominational resources.—Exchange.

CHURCH MEMBERSHIP, REGENERATION, ETC.

No. 1.

Mr. Editor: There are many members of the different denominations, who raise an objection to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, because members are received into it, who, according to our views of conversion, are only seekers, penitents, or inquirers after the truth. This objection has a great bearing, and is often used as a means of proselyting the young and uninformed members of our church. Many cases of this kind have fallen under my own observation. Some time ago in my pastoral visits, I called upon a family, two members of which (daughters), had, when quite young, joined the Methodist Church as probationers; but by neglect, oversight, or some other cause, had never been received into full connection. After their remaining in the church for some two years, they attended a protracted meeting held by another denomination, where they went forward to the anxious seat, and attended the inquiry meeting, where they were asked if they believed that Jesus Christ suffered, and died to redeem them? If they were truly sorry on account of their sins? If they were then willing to forsake all their sins, cast their lot with the children of God, and spend the balance of their lives in His service? These questions being answered in the affirmative, they were told that they were converted, that they were elect, and highly favored children of God; and as an inducement to join that communion (which they did), they were reminded of the length of time they had lived in the Methodist Church as seekers of religion. After holding a family class-meeting with these two young ladies, the conviction was forced upon my mind, that in the Methodist Church, they would still be classed among seekers.

And now, Mr. Editor, as far as my experience has gone, and I have been a tolerably close observer, as to the course pursued by the different branches of the Church of Christ for many years past, and I have never yet known a member of the Methodist Church, to knock at the door of any other branch of the Christian Church for admission, but that that door was thrown wide open to receive him or her, no matter whether such applicant was marked on the roll of the Methodist Church, as believers or seekers.

It is a truth well known, that the ministers and official members of the Methodist Church, never assume the responsibility of deciding whether or not applicants for membership have been converted. We think that it is the privilege of every man to know for himself, whether or not God has for Christ's sake pardoned his sins. True, all may not experience the same measure of joy and peace, when first converted, or even through life. But like Bunyan's Pilgrim, they certainly know when the heavy burden of sin is removed from them.

As a church, we attach more importance to experimental religion, heart-felt, soul-comforting religion, than other denominations, and consequently consider those who have no assurance that their sins have been pardoned, and that they have been regenerated by grace, as seekers. In confirmation that we as a Church, do attach more importance to an experience of grace in our hearts, and the witness of the spirit, than some of the "sister" churches, I will here transcribe a portion of an editorial, from page 237, vol. IV. Calvinistic Magazine, edited by James Gallaher, Frederick A. Ross, and David Nelson, three prominent Presbyterian ministers. The Magazine, before me was published in November, 1850, and the editorial from which I propose giving an extract, is signed N., and headed "A Word to Serious Persons." Here then is what N. says:

"But you inquire, 'Suppose I could go into my closet and ask Christ to save me from my sins, sincerely wishing to fight against them; and suppose I were to ask him for pardon, seeing the fact, that through his vicarious atonement only, I could be pardoned; or in other words, having a proper view of his substitutional sufferings for sin; and suppose I were to plead for forgiveness on account of his death, (having a suitable understanding of the fitness of the work he performed on Calvary, to answer in the room of the sinner's death,) how should I know if I were heard? Would he speak and tell me so? No; he would not. How shall I then know whether or not my sins were pardoned? Would I see a light as a token? No; these things are not mentioned as evidences of conversion in the Bible. Would I know it by a secret strong persuasion of it being impressed upon my heart? or by an unusual joy? or some witness of the nature of inspiration? No; all such expectations are vain, and if felt are not to be trusted to. They are not noticed as marks of regeneration in either of the Testaments, but only in the conversion of weak Christians or deluded professors."

"We must judge from the Bible, if we judge correctly, whether we are pardoned. We must get our confidence by fair scriptural deduction, if it is a proper confidence. The Christian whose hopes are properly founded, can say after the following manner: I have been brought to implore life of the Saviour, feeling that I deserved his frown; and inasmuch as the volume of Inspiration teaches that he turns none away; therefore, I hope I am not rejected." And then, on page 331, the same writer adds, "Some cannot hope that the Saviour has accepted them, because of their lack of joy; or in other words, they cannot believe their sins are pardoned until they have a strong impression that they are pardoned. This is amazingly absurd. God has not promised that we are to know of our condition by having strong persuasions impressed upon us, but as before stated, we are to judge from the Scriptures, and by comparing our cases with the promises of the Bible."

Now, if the above Calvinistic view of regeneration be the true one, and in accordance with the gospel of Jesus Christ, then every sincere seeker in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, is soundly converted, and consequently a suitable person to become a member of any branch of the Christian Church.

My next article, No. 2, will be on the subject of regeneration, the witness of the spirit, etc.

W. SPILLMAN.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

Mr. Editor: In your paper of Jan. 12th, I notice a critique from the pen of Rev. Thos. Nixon, on I Cor. 15th chap. 29th v. "Else what shall they do who are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why then are they baptized for the dead?" In it he makes the dead refer to Christ, and proposes that interpretation as a solution of the difficulty of the text. "If Christ be not risen, then why are they baptized for one who is dead, for a dead body?" It is fatal to this view of the text that "the dead" is plural—the original, in the genitive case, being plural. It must mean "the dead persons," it cannot have, according to the grammatical construction, any reference to Christ. The mystery of the text still remains, M.

RECAPITULATION.—Rev. Mr. Reid published a letter in the Christian Intelligencer, N. Y., from which it appears that he abandoned the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church of America for the purpose of joining the Roman Catholic Church, and that he now forsakes his new friends, with the following confession: "I only wish now to say that by the most indubitable evidence I have now become thoroughly and most sufficiently acquainted with the awful corruption of that mysterious and horrible body, called the Roman Catholic Church."

"MISSIONARY DEBT."—MISS. CONF.

Mr. Editor: Owing to some irregularity, the items usually embodied in the Annual Missionary Report, were not arranged and prepared in due time for the contemplated pamphlet minutes of our Conference, as early as practicable, however, after the adjournment of Conference, with the assistance and under the direction of the President of our Missionary Board, I made ready a statement of the amounts, reported from the several Circuits, Stations, etc., both for the purpose of liquidating the "old debt," and also to carry on the regular Missionary operations of the Conference for the current year. We also had ready for publication as early as practicable, the assessment to the several Presiding Elders' Districts, of their proportion of the amount expected to be raised this year, for the payment of the "old Missionary debt."

From a correspondence with the Secretary of the Conference, I ascertained that he had forwarded the "copy for our Minutes" to Nashville, for publication, and that although the matter in my hands might be in time, still there was reason to doubt, and I have therefore concluded to publish in the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, the following: "The Missionary Board of the Mississippi Annual Conference, having been informed that the Mississippi Conference is expected to raise and pay the sum of $2500, as one proportion of the old debt, due by the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South."

"Resolved, That we will earnestly try to raise one-half of this amount the ensuing year."

In pursuance of this resolution, the Board made the following assessment to the several Presiding Elders' Districts, viz:

Natchez Dist.	$225.00	less $30.00 paid
Vicksburg	200.00	55.00
Jackson	175.00	100.00
Yazoo Dist.	200.00	13.00
Greenville	100.00
Starkville	100.00
Brandon	100.00
Paulding	50.00
Brookhaven	150.00
Arcola	50.00

The credits given to certain Districts are for amounts collected last year, and reported to the Conference at the late session.

We can hardly ask room in the ADVOCATE for a detailed Report of amounts reported from the several circuits and stations, but give the aggregate, as follows:

For Domestic Missions	2363.60
For Foreign Missions	250.40
For old debt	241.30
Total	$2855.30

The collections at Conference, amounted to $374, as nearly as we could ascertain. The account of this collection being in pencil marks, and by different hands, it is difficult to ascertain the precise amount.

H. J. HARRIS,

Secy of Miss'y Board, Miss. Conf.

ONE OF THE LORD'S STEWARDS.—A writer in the N. Y. Evangelist states the following: "A few Sabbath evenings since, a young gentleman in a Reformed Dutch congregation on Fifth Avenue went home from church with his pastor, and after telling him how he had been prospered during the past year, said to him, in substance: 'I have considerable of the Lord's money in my possession; to what good use shall I put it?' His pastor told him that their Board of Foreign Missions was $46,000 in debt, and recommended him to give $5,000 to that Board. He did so at once, and went home. The next morning before breakfast the gentleman came back much troubled in spirit, and said: 'I did not give enough last night.' He sat down quickly and wrote his check for fifty-six thousand dollars, and thus swept off a burdensome debt of their Missionary Board by one stroke of his pen! 'Now,' said he, 'I feel better.'"

Last year, Prof. Morse, and Z. Styles Ely, a merchant of New York, contributed $10,000 each to Union Theological Seminary, New York, to found a course of Lectures on the "Evidences of Christianity," after the style of the famous Boyle and Bampton Lectures in England. The Rev. Albert Barnes was chosen to inaugurate the course, and was to have commenced a series of ten lectures in the Mercer Street Church, New York.

RELIGIOUSNESS—NOT FAITH.

AN EXTRACT.

It is sad to see how many are the victims of religiousness. There are thousands whose ideas of Christianity are so low and erroneous, that they think the Church, with all its various appurtenances, to be an institution equipped with machinery for making goods to be hawked about for sale. Most people seem to have no realization of the great leading truth of Christianity, that "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners;" their conduct seems to indicate that they have imbibed the notion that Christ came not "to seek and to save that which was lost," but to put the stamp of His approval upon such as were using their best endeavors to improve themselves; for religiousness, which is the only gospel known to a multitude of professors, evidently proceeds upon this understanding.

The religious man thinks that the worship makes the worshipper, and therefore we must set diligently about worship, in order to get ourselves accepted. The main idea that man has in connection with worship (such as prayer, and praise, and service) is, that it is the means of securing acceptance, and effecting reconciliation with God. He brings his gifts as the bribes or payments of the criminal, not as the thank-offerings of the forgiven. He worships in order to pacify God, and persuade Him to extend His favor toward him. But God cannot own a religion whose aim is to buy His love, to persuade Him to be gracious, and to accept the person of the worshipper on account of the multitude or excellence of his services. (Rom. iv. 4-8.)

How different from all this is the doing of Jesus! He says, "Man, thy sins be forgiven thee," and never breathes a whisper about any service the man had rendered for it; nor did He lay him under any obligation to serve him for the future. He left him free, and sent him to his house, well knowing that, from gratitude, he would consider himself "free to serve, but not to sin." Jesus drawing near, and freely dispensing His grace to sinners of every sort, cuts up religiousness by the roots.

It is sad, indeed, when men are taught to regard God with a merely natural veneration as "the great and dreadful God," who dwells "in the thick darkness," far removed from the perishing, needy sinner, waiting, with cold and scornful reserve, to receive the homage of a fearing and bondaged people. This is not the God of the Gospel; for Jesus, who is God-man, is really as near to man, as condescending, and as ready to supply all his needs as ever He was. "Who hath required this at your hands?" is, I am assured in my soul, the voice of the Son of God, to those who thus withdraw Him from the nearest and most assured approach of the poor sinner. But alas! how very generally it is done! The Lord Jesus is kept at a distance, religious observances are brought near, and tens of thousands like the feelings that come from all that is acted before them. Their minds are pleased with the sensuous worship, and they mistake sentimentalism for spiritual devoutness. Their eye and ear are engaged, their feelings are charmed, a certain sense of God is awakened; but the precious, immediate confidence of the heart—and conscience is refused. Jesus is not felt to be near, forgiving their sins. They have religiousness, but not faith; the ceremonies and observances of "a worldly sanctuary," but not "the simplicity that is in Christ," in which a purified mind ever delights to walk. Religiousness gives the soul many a serious thought about itself, and many a devout thought about God; but faith gives the soul Jesus, and the words and works of Jesus, and teaches it to have done with fleshly religiousness. Phil. iii. 3.

And it is faith, and faith only—not religiousness and faith combined—that secures any end that is valued of God. Faith "works by love," faith "overcomes the world," faith "purifies the heart," by faith the "elders obtained a good report." Not so of religiousness. It ever works by fear, not by love. It does not "overcome the world," but oft-times takes it away into some recess or hiding-place. It does not "purify the heart" by giving it an object, a divine object, to detach it from self; but keeps self, in a religious attire, ever before it; and it leaves the conscience unpurged. And in God's record it gets no "good report." On the contrary, we find that religious people, the devout observers of carnal ceremonies, those who would not "defile themselves" with a judgment-hall, were the most cruel and strenuous resistors of the truth. But it is the men of faith, the lovers of truth, the poor-broken-hearted sinners, who have found their relief in Jesus "forgiving sin," who have stood, and labored, and conquered, and have their happy triumph trial with Him, and in the records of Him whom they trusted, and in whom, by faith, they found their eternal life, and sure and full salvation. Anxious one, Jesus has power on earth to forgive sins. "ONLY BELIEVE."

Just as thou art, without one trace
Of love, or joy, or inward grace,
Or meanness for the heavenly place,
O anxious sinner! come!

ROMISH INTOLERANCE.

A letter from Dr. Prime, editor of the New York Observer, under date of Dec. 14th, has the following:

You are doubtless aware that Protestant worship is not allowed in public assemblies in the city of Rome, not, indeed, in the Roman States. The only exception to this restriction is that the Embassadors of foreign governments, resident in Rome, having a chaplain of their own will, of course worship in their own way, and if they choose to have public service in their own houses, on the Sabbath day, no objection is made. Under this protection the Russian, the Prussian, the American, and other representatives of their respective governments have for many years had divine service in their houses, and if a chapel has been opened in another part of the city, under the flag or name of the embassy, it would be regarded as a privileged place.

For forty years past the British have been tolerated in holding worship in a hayloft, finished off as a chapel, just outside the wall by the Porto del Popolo. They call it the English Church, and it is generally supposed they are outside the wall because they can not get the privilege of being inside. But they are merely there because they can not find a more commodious place, and they have no license to worship there or elsewhere. No public worship, except the Romish, is tolerated by law under the dominion of the Pope of Rome. But the practice is better than the law. It has grown into a custom of the authorities to wink at or overlook the religious assemblies of strangers, visitors at Rome; and as much of the money brought into Rome and spent here, is that of the people who come to see the city, it is the interest of the authorities to be indulgent to their guests. If Protestant service in the Italian language were set up it would soon be set down.

For six years and more, the Scotch Presbyterians have had a station here. Indeed, they have two; one the Free Church, the other the Church of Scotland. The chaplains have held service every Sabbath, in their own apartments, with a few of their countrymen, rarely more than thirty or forty being present. No sign or notice is allowed to be put up on the house to designate it as the place of worship. The stranger finds it advertised at his hotel, and, coming to the number, prows up the dark, stone stairways to some very upper chamber; and there, as secretly as the early Christians in the catacombs of Rome, or in the dens and caves of the earth, he finds a few like-minded, who pray, and hear the Word. These services disturb no one, and the authorities do not notice them. They affect to ignore their existence altogether.

On Saturday, December 29, 1866, the chaplains of these two missions were served with the following warning issued by the British Consul. I copy it verbatim from the original, now before me:

British Consulate at Rome, Dec. 21, 1866.

SIR,—It is my official duty to inform you that Monsignore Randi, Governor of Rome, has just communicated to me that you are holding illegal religious meetings in your house, which, you must know, are prohibited by the Roman law, and that you have thus placed yourself in the power of the Inquisition, both for arrest and imprisonment.

But as the Monsignore permits me to give you this notice, I would seriously advise that you at once put an end to these innovations, and that you visit Monsignore Randi at Monte Citorio, and assure him that you will never again repeat these illegal acts. I hope in this way you may possibly suspend your exile, which is now hanging over you.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
JOSEPH SEVERN, British Consul.
To Rev. JAMES LEWIS.

I will not characterize this letter as it merits. Instead of expressing his regret at being compelled to give such a notice, and offering his official and personal aid to secure a favorable consideration of the case, this Consul evidently takes special pleasure in being able to bring his countrymen under censure, and it is not strange that he is accused of being the instigator of the offensive measure. However that may be, the letter is unworthy of any official, and would be properly noticed by the expulsion from office of its author. But it was actually served upon the two Scotch preachers. One of them, Rev. Mr. Williamson, was also informed by the woman whose apartments he had hired, that she would not allow the people to come into the house for public worship any more; and, of course, he had to submit to the woman-power and closed his chapel.

The other minister, Mr. Lewis, called upon the Duke of Argyll, Mr. Caldwell, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Odo Russell, and other distinguished British gentlemen here, and took counsel of them, but it was not prudent for them to interfere. He then went directly to the Governor of Rome, in whose hands this matter would lie, and laid the case before him. The result was that Mr. Lewis became satisfied that the Roman Government would rather not know anything of his movements, and he might preach and pray in his own house as much as he liked; if he did not make a noise about it. He returned home, and the next day held his usual service; and I had the pleasure of hearing him preach from the words "And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, in Rome, and received all that came in unto him, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him," Acts xxviii. 30.

Subsequently he says, under date of Jan. 5th:

Worse than our worst fears, the blow has been struck, and Presbyterians are ordered to desist from public worship in all the Papal dominions!

Yesterday, Mr. Odo Russell, as the acting representative of the British Government had an interview with Cardinal Antonelli, the Prime Minister of the Pope. Mr. Russell expressed his surprise on being informed that an order had been issued requiring the Scotch Presbyterians to desist from the worship they had been holding in the private houses of their pastors. He asked the Cardinal if he was aware that these meetings had been held for six years past, without objection being made by any one, and if there were any special reason why they were now so summarily suppressed. The Cardinal intimated, in reply, that the Government had for many years past been under restraint; but now that foreign protection was removed, they would administer it according to their own views of duty; that one English chapel was open, and that was enough for the English in Rome.

Mr. Russell said the Cardinal must be aware that the suppression of Presbyterian worship would produce a great excitement in Britain, and the action of the Pontifical Government would be loudly condemned. This suggestion, however, produced no effect, and Mr. Russell remarked that the Americans are allowed to have a place of worship. To this the Cardinal answered that the Government would attend to that also! Finding argument and remonstrance vain, Mr. Russell retired and reported the result of his interview. The two places of worship are, therefore, preposterously closed! There is, therefore, no place in Rome, or in the Papal dominions, where Presbyterians are admitted for divine worship.

Paul could preach two whole years, in his own hired house, in Pagan Rome. But Pagan Rome forbids the Protestant follower of the apostle to worship God, with his friend, in his own hired house. Pagan Rome was more tolerant in Paul's day than Pagan Rome in ours.

The annual sale of pews in Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's church at Brooklyn, came off on the 7th inst. It was supposed by many that Mr. Beecher's recent course would have the effect of diminishing the rental. The amount, however, exceeded $50,000; last year it was $43,000. The church, during the twenty years of its existence, has not lost more than one-half of one per cent on its pews, and for the past six years not one cent. The rents are paid half-yearly in advance, and if any pewholder is delinquent, his pew is rented again in thirty days, to one of the many who are waiting for chances, the new renter paying the arrears. Such a financial history is without a parallel among the churches of this country.

NEW SCHOOL.—At a celebration of the Fourth Presbyterian church, Washington City, D. C., Sabbath school, on Sunday evening, the 18th inst., of which the Rev. Dr. John C. Smith is pastor, the Hon. Samuel McKee, member of Congress from Kentucky, was speaking to the school and the teachers, and made an incidental allusion of a kind nature to the colored Sabbath-school of the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian church, of which the Rev. Highland Garnet was lately pastor. A storm of coughs, sneezes, and hisses, immediately broke out, and was continued until Col. McKee left the pulpit.

JAPAN.—At Yeddo, the Council of State is erecting buildings for a school intending to give a high education, including a French and English department, and the Protestant missionaries have been requested to take charge of the latter. A Japanese English Dictionary, containing some forty thousand words, is now nearly ready for the press. Most of the missionaries have been working at a translation of the Bible, and in a few months it is hoped that the four Gospels will be published in the Japanese language.

A NATURALIST'S HOME.

There is no place like England for a rich man to live in exactly as he pleases. It is the appropriate exercising-ground for the hobbies of all mankind. The hobby of the late Charles Waterton, naturalist, was a very innocent one, namely, to make his home a city of refuge for all persecuted birds—a sanctuary inviolate from net and snare and gun; and he effected his humane purpose. The name of the place was Walton Hall, near Wakefield. It was situated on an island, approachable only by an iron foot-bridge, and having no other dwellings in its immediate neighborhood. The lake in which it stood gave the means of harboring waterfowl of all kinds; it was sufficiently extensive to allow of portions being devoted to absolute seclusion, for those birds which are naturally disposed to avoid the haunts of man. Two-thirds of the lake, with its adjacent wood and pasture land, were kept free from all intrusion whatever for six successive months every year; even visitors at the house, of what ever rank, being warned off those portions set apart for natural history purposes. Even the marsh occupied by the herons was forbidden ground throughout the whole breeding season, unless in case of accident to a young heron by falling from its nest; in which case aid was afforded with all the promptitude exhibited by the fire-escape conductors for the safety of human life.

Four sycamores, with roosting-branches for peacocks, and a fifth, whose decayed trunk was always occupied by jackdaws, screened the house from the north winds. Close to the east-iron-bridge entrance was a ruin, on the top of whose gable, at the foot of a stone cross, twenty-four feet above the lake, a wild-duck built her nest, and hatched her young for years. A great yew-fence inclosed this ruin on one side, so that within its barrier birds might find a secure place for their nests and incubation. For the special encouragement and protection of the starling and the jackdaw, there was erected within this fence a thirteen feet high stone-and-mortar-built tower, pierced with about sixty resting-benches. To each berth there was an aperture of about five inches square. A few, near the top, were set apart for the jackdaw and the white owl. The remaining number were each supplied at the entrance with a square loose stone, having one of its inferior angles cut away, so that the starling could enter, but the jackdaw and owl were excluded. The landlord of these convenient tenements only reserved to himself the privilege of inspection, which he could always effect by removing the loose stone.

The lake had an artificial underground sluice, which, issuing out a little distance into sight, furnished the means of cultivating a knowledge of the mysterious habits of the water-rat; this stream then passed through one of the loveliest groves in England. Near this place were two pheasants, the central portion of each consisting of a clump of yew-trees, while the whole mass was surrounded by an impenetrable holly fence; the stable-yard was not far off; and hence the squire had infinite opportunities of establishing the important fact, as he considered it, that the game-cock always elaps his wings and crows, whereas the cock-pheasant always crows and clasps his wings. Mr. Waterton's interest in natural history was, however, by no means confined to the animal creation. He concerned himself greatly with the culture of trees (though by no means of land), and hailed any usus natura that occurred in his grounds as other men welcome the birth of a son and heir. Walton Hall had at one time its own corn-mill, and when that inconvenient necessity no longer existed, the millstone was laid by in an orchard and forgotten. The diameter of this circular stone measured five feet and a half, while its depth averaged seven inches throughout; its central hole had a diameter of eleven inches. By mere accident, some bird or squirrel had dropped the fruit of the filbert-tree through his hole on to the earth, and in 1812 the seedling was seen rising up through that unwonted channel. As its trunk gradually grew through this aperture and increased, its power to raise the ponderous mass of stone was speculated upon by many. Would the filbert-tree die in the attempt? Would it burst the millstone? Or would it lift it? In the end, the little filbert-tree lifted the millstone, and in 1863 wore it like a crinoline about its trunk, and Mr. Waterton used to sit upon it under the branching shade. This extraordinary combination it was the great naturalist's humor to liken to John Bull and the national debt.

In no tree-faneer's grounds were there ever one tenth of the hollow trunks which were to be found at Walton Hall; the fact being, that the owner encouraged and fostered decay for the purposes of his birds' paradise. These trees were protected by artificial roofs in order to keep their hollows dry, and fitted thus for the reception of any feathered couple inclined to marry and settle. Holes were also pierced in the stems, to afford ingress and egress; and one really would scarcely be surprised if they had been furnished with bells for "servants" and "visitors." In an ash-tree trunk thus artificially prepared, and set apart for owls, (the squire's favorite bird,) an ox-eyed titmouse took the liberty of nesting, hatching, and maturing her young. Mr. Waterton attached a door, hung on hinges, to exactly fit the opening in the trunk, having a hole in its inferior portion for the passage of the titmouse. The squire would daily visit his tenant, and, opening the door, delicately draw his hand over the back of the sitting bird, as though to assure it of his protection. But unfortunately, after the bird had flown, a squirrel one year took possession of this eligible tenement, and although every vestige of the lining of its nest was carefully removed, no titmouse or any other bird ever occupied it again.

In May, 1862, the squire pointed out no less than three birds' nests in one cavity—a jackdaw's with five eggs; a barn-swall's with three young ones, close to which lay several dead mice and a half-grown rat, as in a larder, and, eighteen inches above the owl's nest, a redstart's, containing six eggs! Our author deduces from this circumstance, that in an unreclaimed state, birds, although of different species, are not disposed to quarrel; and the fact that near this "happy family" a pair of water-hens hatched their eggs in a perfectly exposed nest, under the very eyes of two carrion crows who occupied the first floor of the same tree, an alder, without the least molestation, seems to confirm this view.

In this Garden of Eden, however, all sorts of anomalous things seem to have been done by birds. In a cleft branch of a fir-tree, twenty-four feet from the ground, a peacock built her nest, through which piece of ambition, since falling is much easier to learn than flying, she lost all her young ones. In the branch of an oak, twelve feet from the ground, a wild-duck nested, and brought down all her brood in safety to their natural element. A pair of coots built their nest on the extreme end of a willow-branch closely overhanging the water; but the weight of the materials, and especially of the birds themselves, depressed it so that their habitation rested on the very surface of the water, and its contents rose and fell with every ripple; and, finally, another pair of coots who had built their house upon what they considered terra firma found themselves altogether adrift one stormy morning, and continued so, veering with the fickle breeze for many days, until at last the eggs were hatched, and their young family became independent, and could shift for themselves. All these minute were carefully watched by the squire. An excellent telescope enabled him to perceive from his drawing-room window the manoeuvres of both land and water-fowls. You could carefully scrutinize their form, their color, their plumage, the color of their legs, the precise form and line of their mandibles, and not unfrequently even the color of the iris of the eye; also their mode of walking, of swimming, and of resting. You could distinctly ascertain the various kinds of food on which they lived and fed their young. . . . You could see the herons, the water-hens, the coots, the Egyptians and the Canada geese, the carrion crows, the ring-doves, (occasionally on their nests,) the wild-duck, teal, and widgeon. No less than eighty-nine descriptions of land-bird, and thirty of water-fowl, sojourning in the grounds or about the lake of Walton Hall. In winter, when the lake was frozen, it was literally a fact that the ice could sometimes not be discerned, it was so crowded by the thousands of waterfowl that huddled together upon it without sound or motion.

Mr. Waterton, it may be easily imagined, was himself no sportsman; but it was his custom to supply his own table on a fast-day with fish shot by himself with a bow and arrow. Otherwise, he made war on no living creature, except the rat: the "Hanoverian" rat, as he designated him with bitterness; and even him he preferred to exile than destroy. On his return home from his famous wanderings in South America, he found the hall so infested with rats that nothing was safe from them. But having caught a fine specimen of the "Hanoverian" in a "harmless trap," he carefully smeared him over with tar, and let him depart. This astonished and highly-scented animal immediately scented all the rat-passages, and thus impregnated them with the odor of all others most offensive to his brethren, who fled by hundreds in the night across the narrow portion of the lake, and were no more seen. Though very bigoted in religious matters, the squire was indeed a most tolerant and tender-hearted man. He built a shelter upon a certain part of the lake expressly for poor folks, who were permitted to fish whether for purposes of sale or for their own dinners; and not, withstanding that it was his custom to dress like a miser and a scare-crow, and to live like an ascetic—sleeping upon bare boards with a hollowed piece of wood for a pillow and fasting much longer than was good for him—he was very charitable and open-handed to others.

Wishing to make experiment as to whether his Moorali poison, obtained in 1812 from the Macoosli Indians, was more efficacious than the bite of the rattlesnake, he got an American showman to bring him twenty-four of these dangerous reptiles, and took them out of their cases, one by one, with his own hand, while the Yankee fled from the room in terror, accompanied by very many members of the faculty, who had assembled to witness the operation. In his old age, he alone could be found to enter the cage of the Borneo orang-outang at the Zoological Gardens, in order minutely to inspect the palm of its hand during life, and also the teeth. It was with difficulty he obtained permission to run this hazard, the keepers insisting upon it that the beast would "make very short work of him." However, nothing daunted, the squire entered the palisaded inclosure. "The meeting of these two celebrities was clearly a case of love at first sight, as the strangers embraced most affectionately, kissing one another many times, to the great amusement of the spectators. The squire's investigations were freely permitted, and his fingers allowed to enter his jaws; his apship then claimed a similar privilege, which was as courteously granted; after which the orang-outang began an elaborate search of the squire's head."—Chambers's Journal.

MUSIC AN ECHO FROM HEAVEN.

The sublime origin, mysterious attributes, and exalted purposes of this wonderful art would seem to be no less approved by the position it has received in Scripture than suggested by the facts which disclose its character to the mere student of nature. The inventor of musical instruments has received his commemoration among the earliest records of the inspired history. You may well imagine that a still simpler form of music—the melody of the human voice—was one of the gifts consecrated to the service of the Creator in the time of man's innocency. The history of music, so far as it is interwoven with the texture of Holy Writ, and the nature, as far as it can be known, of the various musical instruments specified in the Bible—some obsolete, and others differing materially from instruments of like name in modern art—are matters of intense interest, and to which we may hereafter allude. At present we will but remind our readers of the place assigned to music not only by the regulations of the Jewish church and in the well-known exhortation, Eph. 5: 19, but in the vision of the heavenly Jerusalem, Rev. 14: 2, and 5: 8, 9, "I heard a voice which was as the voice of harpers harping with their harps, and they sang as it were a new song before the throne." This music, it may be said, is an echo from heaven, as ancient as the creation of angels—a celestial counterpart of those sweet sounds which form its earthly reflection, and may have been the medium of the divine praise ever since there were creatures to adore their Creator, or possibly it may even be the expression of some inward harmony in the divine nature itself. But, according to the testimony of the Scriptures, it seems destined to reach on into the boundless future of eternity. Whether or not (as Milton has sung and Haydn illustrated) it formed the vehicle of praise in Paradise, we know—what is an infinitely stronger proof of its unearthly character and purpose—that it constitutes the most intelligible type of the mode in which angelic worship is actually expressed. Of all the arts by which it has pleased the Creator to relieve the sadness and weariness of the world, or to symbolize his own power and glory, music is that alone which bears, even on its very surface, the stamp of its supernatural character and the anticipation of its undying life. Immaterial in its nature, it penetrates to the soul without the intervention of any corporeal medium. So far it is like inspiration itself. It is the only one of all the arts which does not corrupt the mind. If applied to licentious poetry, the poetry corrupts the music, not the music the poetry. Other arts are material—their place is on the earth; and when the truths which they may now serve to impress on the eye of faith shall have become visible realities, their mission will cease, and they will resign their office into the hands of the queen of all the arts—an echo from heaven—which is alone endowed with capacities for discharging it when time shall be no more.

FARM AND GARDEN.

APPLE ORCHARDS.—As a general thing, the orchard is a much abused institution. It seems a bold undertaking, nowadays, to plant an apple orchard. As usually managed, we do most undoubtedly consider it such, and think the owner must be a man sanguine of long life and big with hopes of fruition. We confess that, at our time of life, we should despair of ever tasting of the fruit of any apple orchard we should set out, and consider our work as done for posterity.

"We remember, however (says the Horticulturist), once expressing ourselves in this way to Mr. Charles Downing, on a visit to his model grounds. He pool-pooled us with the encouraging remark, 'I was older than you are when I planted these apple trees, and I expect to enjoy their fruit for some time yet.' Those trees were at the time in full bearing, and any other than an expert would have said they were nearly as old as the proprietor himself; but there are very few Downings among our fruit-growers.

"The usual method of proceeding is to take a lot which has been cropped to death or kept in meadow until it is no longer profitable as such, and without further preparation than a simple breaking-up of the ground, to dig so many holes, and plant your apple trees; then the grass is allowed to grow up around them, or the lot is seeded afresh, and annual crops of grain or grass taken the soil. What wonder that orchards managed in this way never amount to anything, and that premature decrepitude follows? We have observed just such orchards, year after year, struggling for dear life, the proprietor growing gray waiting for his trees to grow. If they survive the first year after their planting, they live long, showing in course of ten years a misshapen and unsightly head, supported by a trunk of about three or four inches diameter, beautifully garnished with moss, and knobs and other excrescences; skin bound, and pretty thoroughly perforated with the borer—(all unhealthy subjects seem to be the special favorites of insect enemies).

We have had some dear experience in this line ourselves. At the time of setting out a number of young trees in an old orchard, two trees were planted in a spot, adjacent to which we subsequently put a cold grape-vine, the border of which was run close up to these trees. This border being very deep, and constructed with more than ordinary care, showed an immediate effect upon the two trees, which commenced growing very vigorously, and are at this day beautiful and symmetrical objects; fruiting well; large and perfect fruit; and, to all appearance, double the age and size of the trees in the orchard planted at the same time with them. These two trees have been a volume of instruction to us; they have shown us the conditions of success in planting, and subsequent management; and we have learned this much, at least, that it is worse than wasted time to plant an orchard without most thorough previous preparation of the soil."

PROTECTING SOILS IN WINTER.—The importance of winter mulching, sheltering from winds and other modes of protecting the soils and plants which grow in it from the effects of freezing and cutting winds, has been much dwelt upon by writers of late years. The advantages of such protection have been well understood by many cultivators. But there have been no distinct or accurate observations showing the precise amount of difference between exposure and the different kinds of covering. Having recently made some examinations (says the Country Gentleman) we report them with the hope that they will lead to others of a more directly applicable character on the part of some of our readers.

The observations were made on soil early in winter, after exposure to cold averaging some ten or twelve degrees below freezing, for about a week, accompanied with a good deal of wind. The depth to which the ground was found frozen will indicate the various degrees of advantage resulting from the different kinds of protection.

Bare soil beaten moderately hard in a farm road was found frozen very hard to an average depth of six inches with a variation of an inch or so, as the surface was more or less exposed to the sweep of the winds. It should be remarked that all the soils examined were a strong heavy loam.

Soil which had been plowed last summer, but had become settled and hard, and a beaten path slightly covered with grass, were both frozen down about five inches.

Soil mowed late in autumn, hard soil sheltered ten feet high, and pasture closely grazed, were all frozen down about four inches.

Under soft pasture grass covering the surface two or three inches in thickness, the soil was frozen to a depth of one and a half to two and a half inches, varying with the degree of exposure on knolls or flat surface; and in depressions a foot deep and several feet wide, where the grass was somewhat thicker, there was little or no frost.

Under the lee of a ten foot evergreen screen, three feet from it, hard ground was frozen only two inches deep. About the same depth of frost was found where the soil was covered with an inch or two of leaves, or with an inch of moss, in an exposed situation.

Soil entirely under the prostrate branches of evergreen trees or covered with short grass, close beside such trees, was frozen down about an inch. Soil covered with an inch of fine moss, near dense evergreen screens, was not frozen at all.

These observations will suggest to cultivators some practical hints in the planting and cultivation of half hardy or tender plants and shrubs. The advantage of mellow surface, acting as a non-conductor of frost, is shown by the lessened depth in freezing, good drainage being necessary for such pulverization. When the pulverization is very perfect the frost scarcely causes adhesion among the particles, and it is therefore nearly impossible for it to heave or throw out the roots. Late fall rains may, however, render such soils more compact—rendering inadvisable to tread the surface to exclude the rain in cases of late autumn transplanting unless it can be done by leaves or other artificial covering.

The protection afforded by a thick coating of grass when compared with a closely grazed surface, is quite striking, and shows at least one of the reasons of the great superiority of pastures in Spring that are not severely fed off in Autumn.

The protection afforded by moss and leaves in exposed situations, points out the importance of winter mulching to tender plants, or even to hardy ones, as strawberries, or to the roots of trees liable to injury, as dwarf pears.

The remarkable protection afforded by evergreen screens and trees is an additional corroboration of the many observations made of late years on this branch of the subject. There is no question that by surrounding a plot of ground with dense evergreens, accompanied with coverings of leaves or moss, many plants generally regarded as green house plants might be subjected wholly to open air culture.—*N. Physical Effects of Brain Labor.

A Paris correspondent of one of the London journals stirs up a question long mooted in regard to the effect of hard brain labor on longevity. He notices that most of the talented men of France reach a mature age:

"Look, for instance, at some of the men of the Academie Francaise. Mr. Viennet, although 89 years of age, is yet in the full enjoyment of his intellectual faculties. M. de Segur, at 86, is as alive to all that is going forward as he was 30 years ago; de Pongerville, 76, completed the other day the revision of his fine translation of 'Lucretia,' the fourth edition of which has just appeared; Lebrun, at 82, is as hale as ever; Villemain, the father of the Academy, whose election took place in 1821, is 76; every now and then we hear of his being seriously ill, but for all that, he has not the remotest idea of either vacating his feteuil or of giving up his functions of perpetual secretary, which he fulfills with the most assiduous punctuality. Lamartine is 76, yet his step is elastic, and he holds himself as upright as when he saved the country from republicanism in 1848. Flourens, 78, has been ill for ten years, yet attends regularly. Count Charles de Montalembert, and Ponsard, the popular poet—although both ill—are still in the full possession of their brilliant faculties. M. Guizot, 79, and M. Thiers, 69, still represent the July monarchy with all their wonted vigor, and each of these veteran Orleanist statesmen enjoys robust health. Berryer, 74, the staunch legitimist, is as bright and active as any man of half his age. Victor Cousin, the delightful biographer of the celebrated women of Louis XIV's time, although suffering from chest disease, preserves his health by annual visit to Cannes during the winter. The Duke de Broglie, 82, son-in-law to Madame de Stael, is still as polished and strong as though he were made of steel."

PRINTING THE SCRIPTURES.—The American Bible society employs at the building in Astor Place twenty Adams's power-presses and four hundred hands in the different departments of printing, binding, etc., and is able to print between four and five thousand copies of the Scriptures every day. The great work of preparing the stereotype plates for the Arabic Scriptures will be finished in about six months.

How to CLEAN TIN.—Never use lye to clean tin; it will soon spoil it. Make it clean with soda, and rub with whiting, and it will look well and last longer.

The gold and silver product of the Pacific States and Territories for the year 1866 is estimated at $106,000,000.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

WHITE BREAD.—After all that has been said and written about good light, and the decided aversion that every one has to poor bread—heavy, dark and sour, or soggy—is surprising to see how many families never have a loaf of light bread except what they buy at the baker's. If mothers realized how much irritability among their children arises from indigestion, caused by heavy bread, they would certainly make it a point to have light bread at any cost of time and trouble to learn. We assure our readers that the following receipt, accurately followed, will produce light, sweet bread: Sift four quarts of flour into a pan. Put into another pan or bowl a handful of Indian meal, a little salt, and a bit of butter, or tablespoonful of nice lard; on this pour two quarts of boiling water. Stir it, and pour the mixture on to the flour in the other pan, boiling hot. Add some cold water to make it soft enough to mould out, and then work it well with the hands, kneading it up lightly, not jamming and pounding it down in the pan. Let it rise over night; in winter, near the stove. In the morning work it up lightly into four good loaves, and let it set half an hour rising in the pans; then bake it two hours if the heat is moderate, but less if it is a very quick heat.

RICH MINCEMEAT.—Ingredients:—Three large lemons, three large apples, one pound of stoned raisins, one pound of currants, one pound of suet, two pounds of moist sugar, one ounce of sliced candied orange-peel, one ounce of sliced candied citron, and the same quantity of lemon-peel, one teaspoonful of brandy, two tablespoonfuls of orange marmalade. Mode: Grate the rinds of the lemons, squeeze out the juice, strain it, and boil the remainder of the lemons until tender enough to pulp or chop very finely. Then add to this pulp the apples, which should be baked, and their skins and cores removed; put in the remaining ingredients one by one, and, as they are added, mix everything very thoroughly together. Put the mincemeat into a stone jar with a closely-fitting lid, and in a fortnight it will be ready for use.

TO DRESS SALT FISH.—Soak in cold water, according to its saltiness; the only method of ascertaining which is to taste one of the flakes of the fish. That fish which is hard and dry will require fourteen hours soaking, in two or three waters, to the last of which add a wine glassful of vinegar. But less time will suffice for a barreled cod, and still less for the split fish. Put the fish on in cold water, and let it simmer, but not actually boil, else it will be tough and thready. Garish with hard-boiled eggs, the yolks cut in quarters, and serve with egg sauce, parsnips or beets. Another method is to lay the pieces you mean to dress all night in water, with a glass of vinegar; boil it enough, then break it into flakes on the dish; warm it up with cream and a large piece of butter, and serve it as above, with egg sauce.

BEST WAY OF COOKING VENISON.—Cut your venison in rather thin slices, pound them, lay them on a dish, and send them to the table. Have a chafin dish on the table, lay some of the slices of venison on the pan of the chafin dish, throw on a little salt, but not so much as for other meat, a lump of butter, and some currant jelly, put the cover on the dish, let it remain a minute or two, take off the cover, turn the slices of meat, place it on again, and in two or three minutes more the venison will be sufficiently cooked. Each person at the table adds pepper to suit the taste. Some prefer venison cooked without currant jelly.

PANCAKES.—One pint of milk, four eggs, one-half teaspoonful of soda, a little salt, flour to make a batter. Fry in boiling lard. Serve with sauce.

ALL FRESH FISH should be dried thoroughly with a clean cloth before putting into the fat, and should be rolled well in sifted Indian meal. Perch and trout, however, are improved by being dipped in a mixture of beaten egg and bread-crumbs. The fat in which fish is tried should not be poured into the dish where the fish is served up.

IN FRYING too much care cannot be taken to have the fat hot enough. To test it put in a piece of bread; if it sinks, the fat is not hot enough. If the fat lacks sufficient heat, the food fried in it will soak up the fat, and be indigestible.

How to CLEAN TIN.—Never use lye to clean tin; it will soon spoil it. Make it clean with soda, and rub with whiting, and it will look well and last longer.

SATURDAY FEBRUARY 16th 1867.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order; or at most of the large towns, post office receipts can be purchased.

To Advertisers.

This paper has for many years been well known in this community as the very best advertising medium by which the business men of the city could bring their merchandise, trades, professions, and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood when it is remembered that the four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States in the Rio Grand, East Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all, more or less active agents for the paper; and when it is also remembered that our paper circulates among a large class of people who seldom see any other New Orleans paper.

THE ADVOCATE!

HOW TO PAY FOR THE ADVOCATE.

See the Circuit Preacher. His name at this office is equal to cash; or, if you prefer, send the money by mail; in that case be sure to register the letter. By paying your subscription to the Circuit Preacher, and taking his receipt, you run no risk.

THE COMMON EFFECT OF TAKING THE ADVOCATE.

It will make you wise. You will talk better, feel more knowing, and look so. You will know almost as much as the Preacher—about some things. You will be able to answer satisfactorily a good many more questions, put to you by your own children. Your wife will get some new ideas as to what is going on in the world, and pick up a few new dishes from the "HOUSEKEEPER'S DEPARTMENT." Possibly you do not care much for such things yourself, but it will do the rest of the family good. There are a few items in the paper about sheep-raising, fruit-raising, gardening and manuring, that will give your son information, and furnish an occasion for introducing and impressing upon him your own methods of planting and managing cattle. You will here learn the real animus of the freedmen—a thing that will baffle any man who does not take the ADVOCATE—what they are doing, what they are leaving undone, and what they seem to be after generally. You will see what Congress is about, how members have doubled their own pay, how much they have been grieved at the rebellion; but are philosophically resolved to make the most out of it. If you live in Louisiana, you will see the deep interest taken in your own State by the Congressional Committee on the "New Orleans Riot," and the very considerable change it contemplates making in the Constitutions of all the States. You will make up your own mind definitely upon the political and moral worth of Mr. Stevens, Mr. Boutwell, and Mr. Sumner, General Butler, Mr. Ashley, and Wendell Phillips. These themes and persons will fill you so full—that, possibly, for a week or two you will have some difficulty in expressing your feelings, so as to do yourself, and the subject, justice; but by waiting and reading more, and giving the country-savers a little more time to concoct new potions, you will find the first difficulty obviated by the greater one of telling what you now think. The PRICE CURRENT will furnish you a diversion by bringing your mind back to the bread and meat side of life, which is a great relief after studying the philanthropy of the times. Whether you wish to buy or to sell, this will prevent you from being cheated without knowing it; and it will show you how faithfully your merchant has executed your commissions.

Do you not wish to know something about the Turks? about "Russia, Prussia; and Austria?" about France and Great Britain, including Ireland? about Italy and the Pope? It is all here. The affairs of Europe alone will occupy you every week for several days, at odd times, before you get them fixed exactly to your mind. The restless forces at work there, the diplomacy, the nice adjustments, the balancings between the great powers, their schemes, and counter-schemes, their Democracies and aristocracies, their reforms and *statu quo*s, will constitute a gentle stimulant for you, fully equal to a brewing of beer, without producing any of its flatulency. Here, too, you may read, and become a judge of good poetry—in the course of a single year—Poetry, which will throw a pleasant rose-colored haze over all your views of things sublimar, mixed. On rainy days, and Sundays when there is no preaching, it will prevent your walking about as if you had lost something. You can sit down and read, or one of the girls can read out loud to you, an article that has as much in it as a sermon, though much shorter. You will feel that there is a world outside of your fence, and if things generally should come to an end sooner than you expect, you will feel the satisfaction of having had timely notice of it in the ADVOCATE. In the higher departments of Religious Phenomena, your attention will be arrested, and doubtless fixed considerably, upon the rare performances, and programme of the Northern Methodist Church, as modified by Southern atmosphere and property. It will furnish you, if you are a Southern Methodist, with a fine opportunity of estimating the particular effect of exactly one hundred years of Ecclesiastical success upon Ecclesiastical piety, and afford you many apposite "ceterary" reflections. The knowledge of "Dr. Whedon's Advance" movement, will prevent you from being overwhelmed at the near prospect of a negro Bishop presiding over a Northern Conference.

To all this you may add the effect upon your children. It will keep them from mischief. On Sundays, instead of wandering off robbing birds-nests, riding ponies, or gadding about generally, they will stay at home, and read the week's news. You know a great deal, and don't care, maybe, about knowing so very much more: it is not so with them, they have everything to learn. They will learn something good, if you help them; something from every man, from every book, from every paper, every bird, or flower; or insect, or little stream. Whatever comes in the way they will question it closely, and get out of it something of good or evil. Be careful who you introduce into your house, what books you place upon your shelves, and what newspaper you read. What an immense difference between a family which reads, and one which never reads! What an endless talk about nothing, when there is nothing to talk about. The same old story for the twentieth time, until no one laughs but the man, the good wife, and the stranger. Only think of it, the short-comings of the next neighbor, the charmed circle of the crops, and the negroes, and fences, and pigs and bad roads, and the repairs needed at the creek-crossing, have to furnish the entire staple of talk for thirty years! Poor stuff to educate a family of smart boys, and sprightly girls upon. This dreadful monotony of thought and talk seeks relief at all cost, anything is welcome that can break it. A good pious, affectionate wife found relief, during the war, for her husband's imprisonment by the Federals, in the reflection that "Pap would have some new anecdotes when he comes back."

To introduce an entire family to the world, and the whole world to a family at the small outlay of THREE DOLLARS, is quite a feat in finance. To let them know what is going on in Paris and London the day before yesterday, what the diplomats are about, and what the fashions threaten to be, may amuse; but the actual discoveries of science, the heroic advance of the navigator and the traveler, the benevolent enterprises of the good, and the steady spread of Christian light from mountain top to valley, kindling the whole landscape, these are truths that do more than interest, they instruct, and elevate any house, or hearth into which the ADVOCATE is permitted to enter.

WHAT THE PREACHERS ARE DOING FOR IT.

Many of them are reading it all themselves. At some points we send 5 or 6 ADVOCATES to preachers, and not one to anybody else. Now there must be some religious people about, or so many preachers would not have there settled. The mails are out of joint, but if the paper fails we are sure to hear of it. The truth is those brethren are much like a boy who has found a tree of ripe persimmons; he does not care if anybody else never finds it. Others, good souls, who like to carry a hat-full home for all the folks, have introduced the paper all over their circuit, and during the past week have sent us handsome lists of subscribers.

PERSONAL.

Rev. J. W. Brown of the Montgomery Conference passed through this city on his way to San Marco, Texas. He is a transfer to West Texas Conference.

THE LINFIELD TICKET. — We venture to name the ingenious Ticket of the Rev. W. E. M. Linfield, after the inventor. See it in the Child's Corner. Already one of our preachers has determined to have a number of them struck off. It promises to be an important assistant to the Missionary Treasury.

THE ADDRESS of the Rev. R. Abbey, is Canton, Miss.

THE BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.

The Change of Name and Lay Representation "will be lost if lost by wanting fewer than 100 votes" says the Southern Christian Advocate. The constitution of the United States will be saved, if saved, by one vote; by the preponderance of a single voice in the decisions of the United States Supreme Court: saved against the overwhelming voice of the Party in power. Joshua-Soule was elected Bishop by the constitutional majority of a single vote. Great results have been frequently determined in the history of this nation by questions being barely lost or carried. It is illusive however, to reason that it is but one vote that does the business, and that the last one. It is the first one, and the middle one, fully as much as the last one. The last feather breaks the camel's back, just as fully, as the last vote determines the entire will of the side upon which it is cast. No one supposes that the last blow breaks the rock, or that the last foot of the telegraphic cable delivers the message.

One vote can express the weight and strength of the constitution as well as a thousand, when by the constitution that one vote is required to make a law. The single message from a thimble battery expresses and contains the great fact of the atlantic cable, and all the costly machinery, and wondrous skill involved in that gigantic achievement of art and science. The vote that passes, or the vote that defeats Lay Representation will express the destruction or the preservation of the constitution of a hundred years, but that vote does not lie merely in the last of the list; nor is the man specially responsible whose name begins with a Z, more than he who first voted because he was first called. The Baltimore Conference is not to be held to more responsibility in the premises than the St. Louis Conference; though the one ends, and the other began to vote on these constitutional, and vital questions. We are sorry to see a disposition to concentrate upon the Baltimore Conference this vast responsibility, and to produce an effect by this undue pressure. Having but recently come into the church South, the point is made would you now defeat "the combined wisdom and work of our late General Conference," and in fact of the whole church, by deciding these questions against so overwhelming and preponderating a vote. It must be admitted that such an appeal, when coming from the "Southern Advocate," and from men high in position, is of great force if not altogether irresistible. To be told that both these questions "can be saved now," that is, if the Conference will do unanimously, as it is directed to do, is well calculated to oppress, by the gravity of the advice and the occasion, even a body as independent as we have a right to suppose the Baltimore Preachers to be. One of the "respected correspondents" waxes urgent, and says in a letter to the "Episcopal Methodist" "now is it not for the glory of God and the good of the church that it (Lay Representation) should be adopted when twenty-one of twenty-five Conferences favor it?" It occurs to us that all these pressings are, to say the very least, gratuitous. Certainly so, if they proceed from those who are too high in office to feel the consequences directly of the passage of a law, which will reduce the body of the ministry from their present position as the sole legislators of the church, to one in which, at most, they will have but a concurrent voice in its law-making. A position which will, by the proposed plan, be less than that of the lay representatives, because, from various causes, there will ever be fewer laymen than clergymen in the General Conference; and because the smaller body is always the more powerful, and influential, where two houses legislate by concurrent majorities.

As for the brother who seeks the "glory of God," we would say that if the constitutional majority is not secured in the vote cast, it will most assuredly not be for the glory of God to "adopt" it. His views are not so full of the glory of his Master but that he can press a few other considerations, such as "if you vote as did the Little Rock, the Mississippi, and the Louisiana, (he might have added the Mobile, and the Tennessee,) then there will be communion, and contention in the conferences, and the church four years longer." How so, who will make it? not the "small minority" if the questions do not carry. And if they do carry, the minority will certainly not insist upon "taking the votes of the conferences again." Those who have "the glory of God" in view will scarcely breed commotion and contention. These fears are therefore idle, except as arguments. Instead of putting the burden of his advice upon the Baltimore brethren the better way would be to adhere to his last and true remedy:—"How easy to secure it at the next General Conference; if defeated now, if the twenty-one or twenty-two conferences favoring the measure should send only such delegates as favor it." All these appeals to the Baltimore Conference to not be in the way of the Southern Church doing some great thing, overlook the broad fact that had not the Baltimore Conference joined us within the past year, these questions would already be constitutionally decided against the very parties who are now pressing it. So that every vote they now get from that quarter is a clear gain, and they should be satisfied. To urge the conference, in view of all the circumstances, to remain neutral, would trespass on its rights and dignity, as much, but scarcely more than to urge it to "cast a strong (unanimous if possible) vote for both measures."

For, when legislating upon Constitutional questions, an Annual Conference is not only distinct from, and entirely independent of a General Conference, but superior to it. It acts as a part of the great mass or entire aggregate of Itinerant Preachers, by virtue of undivided powers, which have been reserved for the express purpose of reviewing, correcting, or confirming General Conference action. Superior to it in point of dignity, as the latter is but a delegated servant, superior in the abiding character of its life, vastly superior in the respect of numbers, and going before it in the order of existence, an Annual Conference needs not to be reminded, from without, what a General Conference wishes, or has done, upon any question affecting the Constitution of the church, nor what it ought to do, or ought not to do.

In a question which is to change the organic structure of the Church, and which involves, it may be, wholesale success, or wholesale destruction, men may well be left to their own responsibility, after placing before them all that can be drawn from the tried experience of the past, or be deserved in the doubtful future by the aid of the feeble light of human reason. We can but hope and believe that the same good Providence which raised up Wesleyan Methodism, will preside over the fortunes of our Zion in this momentous passage of her history.

THE ELIOT BILL.

The protracted throes of the Radical Republican Party in Congress, have terminated in the "Eliot Bill"—a legislative monster. It passed the House by a vote of 113 to 43. Seven republicans voted in the negative. It vests in the President, the appointment of a provisional governor and a council. This Bill and the passage of Stevens' Reconstruction Bill, by a vote of 109 to 55, must be a temporary relief to the atrabiliary temperament of the lower House. They constitute a logical cause, which to our mind looks squarely at, if indeed it does not logically necessitate an attempt to impeach the President. They will seek a fit tool to carry out these violent unconstitutional acts, and if it cannot be found in the President, they will seek to remove him.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

We insert to-day for the first time, the card of Messrs. C. H. McKnight & Co., 89 Magazine street, GROCERS AND GENERAL COMMISSION MERCHANTS. These gentlemen have just opened their house. Mr. McKnight (late in the employ of R. K. Walker & Co.) and Mr. J. Talbot Sawyer (late in the house of Given Watts & Co.) are our personal friends and the sons of old friends. We can, and do most heartily endorse them, as competent, and thoroughly reliable. They have also associated with them Mr. R. Gear, a grocer of many years experience.

LEGISLATURE OF LOUISIANA.

The event of the week was the Election of a U. S. Senator. It will be seen by the following, that the long contest ended in the election of Col. George Williamson, a representative from Caddo Parish. He is well qualified to represent Louisiana, at Washington. His election gives the highest satisfaction to all who have had the good fortune to know Mr. Williamson personally.

The "Crescent" says: Col. Williamson served with distinction, during the war, on the staff of Gen. Polk, and afterwards with Gen. Smith in the Trans-Mississippi department. On the return of peace, he resumed the practice of the law in Shreveport, and now represents the parish of Caddo in the legislature. As a lawyer, he is noted for his clearness of argument and precision of statement; and as a politician, for an integrity and consistency which, combined with his native modesty, have gained for him the esteem of a large circle of friends and admirers.

We give the State of the vote at the last balloting.

And the Hon. George Williamson having obtained a majority of the votes cast was declared by the president duly elected United States senator, for six years from the 4th of March next.

On motion of Mr. Mohan Senate retired to their hall.

On motion of Mr. Nelligan the House adjourned to to-morrow, 12 o'clock M.

THOS. L. MAXWELL,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

ECLIPSES. — There will be four eclipses this year—two of the sun and two of the moon. The former will occur March 9th and August 29th; and the latter, March 20th and September 13th. Those of the moon only will be visible in the United States.

LATEST NEWS.

NASHVILLE, Feb. 12.—The Senate passed the colored suffrage bill on the second reading, refusing to strike out the clause forbidding negroes to sit on juries or hold office. It will pass it on its final reading to-morrow, probably.

Stevens proposed an amendment, which, on objection, he withdrew, saying he had tried vainly to satisfy the gentlemen around him. Boutwell argued that the Supreme Court might decide that the States were still States and entitled to representation, which would cause a hazardous conflict, but if the bill passed, the Supreme Court would have no government to recognize. Congress would keep in its own hands the political reorganization of the States by passing the bill.

At two o'clock, Stevens again moved the previous question, which was negatived. Bingham spoke in opposition, and took an occasion to eulogize Eliot's bill. Blaine moved the previous question to refer the bill to the judiciary committee, which was seconded. Stevens spoke half an hour. He complained pathetically, defended the reconstruction committee, abused Bingham and opposed Eliot's bill because it mentioned something to be done which looked like a finality leading to admission.

This position was greeted with cries of "no, no." Shellabarger explained that there was a special provision in Eliot's bill requiring the assent of Congress to the proposed admission. Stevens seemed regaining his lost power. The main question was taken on Blaine's motion to refer to the judiciary committee. The Democrats generally voted with Blaine. There were two majorities against Blaine. The bill then passed by 109 to 55. Stevens, exulting over the final success of his bill, asked the speaker if it was in order for him to indorse the declaration of the good old Lancers that Heaven yet ruled, and that there were Gods above. Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13.—Stevens's bill as passed reads: "The so-called States."

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13.—It has been arranged that the radicals of the Senate shall hold a caucus during the present week, for the purpose of nominating a candidate for the presiding chair of that body for next Congress.

Senator Wade has expressed himself in favor of extending Eliot's Bill to the whole South, and the proposition is favorably discussed among senators in general.

The tariff bill is to be reported in the House of Representatives.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14.—Senate.—The Louisiana bill was read a second time. Trumbull spoke of several amendments. Wade said if amended too far, they would lose it. He gave notice he would give the Senate no rest when the bill came up, till passed. Sumner was in favor of both bills, Stevens's and the Louisiana. He had amendments to offer, one abolishing all the decrees of the courts since the secession ordinance.

Fossenden was in favor of both bills and Blaine's amendment, which admits the States, on the adoption of the constitutional amendment and impartial suffrage. Wade consented to postpone action, and the amendments were ordered to be printed.

Stevens's bill came up, was read a second time, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14.—The meeting last night of Conservative Republicans, friends of the President, and prominent Southerners in the city, at Willard's was merely colloquial.

Nothing was determined on, though the free exchange of opinions seemed to dispel the gloom somewhat. Other meetings will follow. The anxiety regarding the immediate passage by the Senate of either bill is abating, though the excitement and apprehension is still great.

[Special to the N. O. "Crescent."]

The Elliott Bill on Reconstruction.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 11.—War. The committee discussed at length the right of Congress to legislate to place Louisiana within the control of loyal men. The military must control until the people of Louisiana adopt a constitution assuring safety to the republic, and receiving the sanction of Congress. These results follow successful war.

These results would not follow had it been insurrection instead of civil war. Until a loyal State of Louisiana exists in full accord with the United States, and a republican form of government is guaranteed, the object of the war is unattained. The accomplishment of this requires a temporary provisional government. The loyal people of Louisiana must form such a constitution. Meantime their safety requires a provisional government. In the discharge of their duty the committee submits the following:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President nominate and the Senate confirm a governor of Louisiana, who will hold one year, unless sooner removed by the President, with the consent of the Senate, unless sooner relieved by a successor elected under the provisions of this Act; the governor to be a citizen of Louisiana, and must, at all times, have born true allegiance to the United States, and shall take the oath of July 2d, 1862; in addition that, he has done no act which would work disqualification under the provisions of this Act.

Second.—The President shall nominate and the Senate confirm a provisional council of nine persons, qualified like the governor and taking the same oath, to continue in office unless sooner removed, by the President, the Senate consenting, until a legislature is duly elected under the provisions of this bill; the council, with the governor, are invested with legislative power. In no case shall a governor or councilor enter office until confirmed by the Senate. The council remains in perpetual session with power to adjourn not longer than thirty days. A majority constitutes a quorum.

Third.—It is the duty of the governor to see to the execution of the federal and State laws. He shall nominate, and with the consent of the council, commission officers now existing or hereafter created to hold, unless removed by the governor, the council consenting until the successors are elected and qualified as herein provided. They must be able to take the oath prescribed.

Fourth.—Electors are qualified by this act, unless Congress orders otherwise, the first Tuesday in June 1867, and shall elect a governor, lieutenant governor, a Senate, House of Representatives, and other officers herein provided. Senators and Representatives to the same number, and from the same districts as now, all officers to hold one year or until their successors are duly qualified, unless sooner relieved as herein provided, with powers, duties, fees and compensations as now, unless inconsistent with this act.

Fifth.—The following, and none others shall vote: Male citizen of the United States, twenty-five years old—regardless of race or color—who has resided one year in the State, and never bore arms against the country since he has been a citizen, and can duly take the oath of July 2, 1862; Provided, that any other person otherwise qualified as an elector, who never voluntarily gave aid and comfort to the rebellion nor government inimical to the United States, in any other manner, capacity or rank, than as a private soldier in open and civilized warfare, may be admitted to the rights of an elector by order of a federal court of record, by establishing the fact on the testimony of persons who have always been loyal, and establishing as aforesaid that after the fourth of March, 1864, he never gave voluntary aid and comfort to the rebellion or government inimical to the United States. Upon establishing the above facts and subscribing to an oath that the things are true which bring him within the provision, and that he will bear true allegiance to the government of the United States and the perpetual union of the States thereunder, he shall receive a certificate entitling him to electoral rights.

Sixth.—The secretary of war is authorized to make and publish rules for the just and true registration of electors prior to any election herein ordered, the time for holding elections not ordered in this act, the place and manner of conducting elections, appointment and compensation of officers of election, and every other thing necessary to holding a free election; but all persons so appointed shall be electors under the provisions of this act, and shall take the oath of July 2d, and to faithfully discharge their duties.

Seventh.—On the third Tuesday of October, unless otherwise ordered by Congress, persons qualified shall vote for members of a convention to adopt a Constitution and frame a government for the State of Louisiana. The qualification of twenty-five years old and all others, are required in the case of governor. Under this act, the number of delegates and districts are the same as now for the House. None are entitled to seats unless they take the oath of July 2d, 1862. The Constitution shall not permit distinction on account of race or color; shall recognize the power and duty of the government to enforce perpetual union of the States; shall provide that no debt contracted in support of the rebellion be assumed or paid, no pension compensations, gift or gratuity to any person by reason of anything done or suffered in support of the rebellion. The Constitution is to be submitted to electors qualified by this act, the election to be held under the rules prescribed by the secretary of war, and if approved by a majority, it is to be submitted to Congress.

Eighth.—It is the duty of the President to designate forthwith an officer of the army, not under a brigadier, to be stationed in Louisiana, to be military commander within the State. It is further the duty of the President to place there under the command of such a general a requisite force to execute the duties prescribed whenever the civil authorities refuse, neglect or omit the speedy enforcement of the laws for the punishment and prevention of crime against the rights of any person whatever. The general shall arrest and hold such offender until the civil authorities prosecute. The general shall assist the civil authorities in enforcing the laws regulating elections, and insure the enforcement of the laws without regard to race or color.

Ninth.—The laws of the council or provisional legislature shall be certified to the secretary of the Senate for congressional approval. Should Congress disapprove, the fact shall be certified to the chief justice of Louisiana, and such disapproved laws shall be void after date of the receipt by the chief justice.

Tenth.—Until admitted to representation as a loyal State, Louisiana is allowed one delegate in Congress, chosen at the first election ordered herein. He must have the same qualifications as the governor; shall have the rights and powers of territorial representatives now in the House.

Eleventh.—All the laws now in force in Louisiana consistent with this act and the laws of the United States, shall remain in force until repealed or modified, provided that no person shall be competent to act as a juror who is not an elector. Under this act all expenses incident to the administration of a provisional government herein provided, be collected and paid as now done for the support of the present government.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 11.—The excitement in the House to-day was intense. Stevens, who it is said, had a three column speech on his bill in type, resisted the previous question on the riot committees' bill angrily, but ineffectually. Eliot was anxious to have his bill discussed, but was evidently mystified by the rapid proceedings. After every filibustering motion he wanted to know before the vote the position in which the proposed action would place his bill. His repeated questions produced laughter.

It is feared by the friends of his bill that the House will get in the habit of laughing at him, and destroy the effect of the closing speech to which Eliot is entitled as chairman of the committee.

The motion to adjourn prevailed, pending the vote on the main question, forced by a congressman demanding the reading of the bill, which would occupy an hour. The minority are the most resolute, and on the Republican side there seems to be much dissatisfaction.

LONDON, Feb. 9.—It is officially announced that after the 1st of March, the cable tolls will be reduced one-half.

RUSSIA AND ENGLAND THE CHIEF MOTIVES.

The Liberte has the following:—"It would be vain to deny what is plotting in secret. The division of the Ottoman Empire between Russia and England, both of them cordial allies of Prussia, their not disinterested instrument."

THE APPOINTMENT.

"England is to have Egypt—Prussia the whole of Germany. Russia is to have Turkey, from which, however, would be cut out a kingdom of Greece of a suitable size for King George, the brother-in-law of the Prince of Wales, the heir apparent to the English throne, and brother-in-law also to the presumptive heir to the throne of Muscovy, and therefore the bond of union between Russia and England."

THE VICTIM.

"Turkey, who begins to suspect the fate that awaits her, is making her arrangements, but where is the money to pay the fresh troops she is going to arm?"

"This state of things explains the haughty attitude of Italy toward Turkey. Italy is playing her card."

PARIS, JANUARY 22.—The United States war steamer Swatara, with John H. Surratt on board, arrived at Port Mahon, Island of Minorca, Balearic Islands, recently, and after coaling, sailed again for the United States.

The people of Serbia are flying to arms against Ottoman rule; while at Constantinople the party in favor of peace is increasing in numbers and influence. Morocco, it is reported that the viceroy of Egypt has sent agents to ascertain whether the leading powers of Europe would favor his complete independence of the sovereignty of the porte.

The Queen opened Parliament on the 5th inst. The people manifested no enthusiasm, neither were there any cheers for the Prince of Wales. The Queen's subsequent return to Buckingham Palace was even more dismal than her departure. Cries of "Reform!" greeted the Queen as she passed. The police behaved with great moderation or trouble would have ensued, as the crowd were rife for mischief. The general prediction is, this is the last parliament the Queen will open in person.

Great preparations are making for the reform demonstration on the 11th. The people say they will then show the Queen a procession worth seeing. The bitterness of popular feeling is undisguised, and placards are shown on the streets saying: "men without votes are scum." Every personal regard for the Queen is eclipsed by the reform furor. The Queen has resolved to appear more in public. A series of royal receptions is announced.

La Press, of January 17th, announced that on the 19th, a month's insurance of 200,000 francs was effected in the Hamburg exchange upon the personal property Maximilian, shipped by the Maria to Ragusa.

Ross Winans has received a contract from Russia to build cars and locomotives for that government.

The French minister in Mexico is going to marry a lady there with a dowry of 10,000,000, of francs, and to her family belongs the celebrated silver mine of Real del Monte.

The Gazette de France says, "We lately recorded that at Venice, out of one hundred and ten thousand inhabitants, thirty thousand are receiving assistance from public charity. We have related the commencement of a crisis at Verona. In the island of Sardinia the peasants are reduced to eat herbs and roots like wild beasts. The Sardinian journals teem with harrowing narratives of the distress that prevails, and were so we minded we could a tale unfold that would make our readers shudder. 'Hunger in Italy,' 'Hunger the Order of the Day.' Such are the titles of several articles of the journals of Turin and Florence. The Nuovo Diritto assures the deputies and ministers to save the country not by idle discussions on great European questions, but by dealing with the more pressing questions of bread, meat and fuel. In one cutting phrase the Unita Cattolica characterizes this situation: 'Italy is hungry from the Alps to the Adriatic.'

Cook, the excursionist, has succeeded in renting several large houses in Paris in which he will be able to accommodate about 1500 American and English visitors at a time during the exhibition; the tariff fixed is the moderate price of $1 per head for bed and breakfast. He has also taken a large building in the Quartier of the Champs Elisees, where he will provide superior accommodation at $2 50 a day for each person, this sum to cover every expense.

The king of Greece has conferred the medals of a royal order on two Parisian editors, Girardin and Gueroit.

Already some of the Paris hotels have resolved to develop their sense of international hospitality by greeting their exhibition travelers with an increase of 50 per cent. on their ordinary tariff.

The French emperor has ordered the Paris prefect of police to assist a number of poor people who have been unable to pay their quarter's rent which has just fallen due.

because the CHEAPEST.

Each Hoop is made by braiding two springs
together, edge to edge, forming the STRONG-EST, most FLEXIBLE, and still the LIGHT-
EST Hoop made.

In fact, for promenade, or the house, or the church, the theatre, or for crowded assemblies, fitted with carriage, etc., they are superior to all others, affording COMFORT TO THE WEARER, with that ELEGANCE OF SHAPE which wins favor with all, and has made the

CAUTION.

The Duplex Skirt will admit a pin being run through the centre of each hoop, thereby providing there are TWO SPRINGS braided together therein, which is the secret of their remarkable STRENGTH and FLEXIBILITY—a combination not possessed by any SINGLE-SPRING
Skirt.

The red ink stamp, viz: "J. W. BRADLEY'S

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE AT

BATON ROUGE.

The fifth session of this school will begin on Wednesday, 3d October, 1866.

The object of the school has ever been to afford a complete classical and practical education, or a complete preparation for any stage of the College or University course.

Every student who enters the school is expected to remain to the close of the session in July, and will be held liable for the tuition in all cases, unless protracted illness shall compel his removal.

Students are required to furnish their own bed clothing, towels, wash-basin, mosquito-bar, etc., which can be obtained by addressing me at Baton Rouge, or Rev. J. C. Keener, D.D., New Orleans, La.

As the number of students is limited, it is imprudently advised that application be made as soon as possible.

S. ANDERSON, PHOTOGRAPHER

AND PHOTOGRAPHIC STOCK DEALER,

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

Since the publication of our last issue, the general market has evinced a fair degree of activity, and several of the leading articles have undergone a material alteration. Sugar and Molasses have been in demand, at higher prices, and the movement in Western Produce has been to a fair extent, attended with a better feeling in Flour and Corn; while the movement in our leading staple has been quite liberal and factors, under the influence of more favorable advices from Liverpool and New York, have succeeded in realizing enhanced rates, the market closing firm yesterday at our quotations.

COTTON—On Saturday, under favorable advices from Liverpool and New York, there was a heavy inquiry throughout, and notwithstanding very inadequate offerings, sales to the amount of 8700 bales were effected, at prices 10c higher. On Monday the demand was more general, but the views of holders being materially in advance of buyers, the business was less liberal, comprising at the close 7000 bales, at stiffening prices. Yesterday the market opened with a brisk inquiry, but later in the day the movement was partially interrupted by dark and rainy weather, and consequently the sales were light, footing at the close barely 4900 bales, at previous prices, the market closing firm at our quotations.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 10,402 bales, against 13,603 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 2601 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 508,311 bales, against 460,328 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest date, as compared with last year, is 64,461 bales. If the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 73,922 bales to Great Britain, of 16,910 to France, and an increase of 11,532 bales to other foreign ports.

Low—Ordinary 25 to 30
Good Ordinary 30 to 35
Low Middling 35 to 40
Middling 40 to 45

TOBACCO—There is no change to notice in the Tobacco market since our last review, nor can there be until the supply on sale is increased so as to afford buyers a chance to operate. The stock now actually on sale is reduced to a few hundred hogsheads, and there is little or no room left for making selections or filling orders. Only a few small lots of the new crop have so far been received, the extremely cold, and otherwise very unfavorable weather which has prevailed at the West, having prevented the planters from preparing their crops for shipment. The impression seems to be very general, that our receipts will be materially augmented so soon as the weather will permit, and if these anticipations are realized, we shall no doubt have an active market to report, for there is no lack of parties prepared to operate. The transactions since our last embrace only a few hogsheads. We repeat our previous quotations only for reference.

FLOUR—The stock is light, but the demand is only of a retail character. About 4500 barrels were sold in small lots, on Saturday and Monday, at $10.25 $11. Fine $11.62½ to $11.75 for Superfine, $12 to $12.25 for Single Extra, $12.50 to $13.50 for Double Extra, $14 to $14.50 for Treble Extra, and $15 to $16 per bbl for Choice Extra. Yesterday some 1500 bbls. were sold, in small lots, to the trade, at the foregoing prices. Arrived during the past three days 1975 bbls. Cleared for Texas 48, Utile 12, Campeachy 300 bbls.; together, 360 bbls.

Monetary.

There has been a limited movement in Coin during the past three days, and rates, in agreement with the course of prices at New York, have been attended with a decline. Gold opened on Saturday at 137 to 137½, and without exhibiting any material irregularity, closed steady at the same; it opened on Monday at 136½ to 136¾, and after the transactions of a trifling business, closed weak at 136, and opened yesterday at 136½, but later in day became more buoyant, and closed steady at 136½ to 136¾.

ONLY WAITING.

A very aged man in an almshouse was asked what he was doing there. He replied, "Only waiting."

Only waiting till the shadows
Are a little longer grown;
Only waiting till the glimmer
Of the day's last beam is down;
Till the night of earth has faded,
From the heart once full of day;
Till the stars of heaven are breaking Through the twilight soft and gray.

Only waiting till the reapers
Have the last sheaf gathered home,
For the summer time has faded,
And the autumn winds have come.
Quickly, reapers gather quickly
The last ripe hours of my heart,
For the bloom of life has withered,
And I hasten to depart.

Only waiting till the angels
Open wide the mystic gate,
At whose feet I long have lingered,
Weary, poor and desolate.
Even now I hear their footsteps,
And their voices far away;
If they call me, I am waiting,
Only waiting to obey.

Only waiting till the shadows
Are a little longer grown;
Only waiting till the glimmer
Of the day's last beam is down;
Then, from out the gathering darkness,
Holy, deathless stars shall rise,
By whose light my soul shall gladly Tread its pathway to the skies.

HUME'S ARGUMENT AGAINST MIRACLES.

Mr. Hume, says our belief in miracles can rest only upon the credibility of human testimony. He argues that we should not receive the testimony of those who testify that they have seen miracles wrought, because it is contrary to experience that miracles should be true, but it is not contrary to experience that testimony should be false—therefore, upon balancing the probabilities, they are against our belief in miracles.

Let us analyze this argument. What is experience? It is in general what has been realized or observed. In particular what we have realized or observed; then to say that miracles are contrary to experience, is a gratuitous assumption, is to assert what ought to be proved; for persons of the best reputation have asserted that they have witnessed the working of miracles. Mr. Hume can only mean, that he nor any one with whom he was acquainted, had ever witnessed the working of a miracle. It devolves on those who adopt Mr. Hume's argument, to prove that no one in any age has seen a miracle wrought.

To proceed with the analysis of the argument, a miracle is not contrary to our experience; for the sufficient reason that we have no experience on the subject. A statement or alleged fact to be contrary to our experience, must actually oppose, contradict, that which we have realized, or observed; for example, if it should be affirmed, that on the first day of January, 1867, while the Governor of the State, was addressing the people in the Capitol, the hair of his head suddenly turned entirely white, but we being present at the time and place designated, neither saw nor heard anything of this extraordinary phenomenon, this would be contrary to our experience. The affirmation that miracles have been wrought does not thus contradict our experience.

Further, if we are not to believe the testimony of witnesses, unless they testify to something we have seen, or something analogous, then, we must not believe the narration of a traveler, who informs us that on a certain portion of the globe visited by him, there is no winter, but perennial Spring and Summer. Or the narration of another tourist, that he has visited a portion of the earth, where the sun shines ninety days consecutively, without once sinking below the horizon; because such phenomena have never been witnessed by us.

This argument when further analyzed, finally drives to the rejection of the testimony of our own senses. For example, in my travels West,

I come upon the hot Spring in Arkansas, but I have never seen or felt of the water of a hot Spring. I have seen a thousand springs and more, but never a hot one, this (upon Mr. Hume's reasoning) is contrary to my experience, and must as such be rejected. It is true it feels hot, it steams, boils, and looks hot, but because I have not so experienced before, I must doubt the evidence of my senses, and deny that it is a hot spring at all.

This argument, (so called) is as great a fallacy as was ever couched in so many words, for we have in fact pointed out but a portion of its more obvious fallacies, but enough to show that it is without any claims to logical truth or strength.

The possibility of miracles cannot be denied without denying the Being and attributes of God. Christians do not attempt to account for miracles, through the operation of the ordinary laws, by which God governs the material universe, but by the immediate and special agency of the Almighty, for the confirmation of certain great moral truths. If man needs a revelation from God, and certainly his ignorance, depravity, and misery, clearly proves that he does, it should not seem to be more than we ought to expect from the allwise and beneficent Author of our existence, that He would give such a revelation as his glory and our circumstances require, and to authenticate it by works (or miracles) manifestly above human power. This, then, is the Christian position, man needed a revelation, God has been graciously pleased to give it to him, and confirm it by displays of supernatural power.

MARIA FEDAROWNA OF RUSSIA.

A FRAGMENT.

Czar! Supreme ruler over the seventh part of all the earth, over an empire on whose vast realms the sun never sets. He expresses the wish—and a wilderness is converted into a paradise; he commands—and the fable of Aladdin's Palace is realized. What is impossible to the omnipotence of his love? and what can continue to live when he hates? No other mortal was carried so high by the billow of life.

But he, too, like his humblest serf, is accessible to the joys and sorrows of the father. In the Spring of 1865, he lost his first-born, the Crown Prince, by death; and in November, last year, his second son, a noble youth, was married.

Of the unparalleled magnificence of the festivals attendant on this royal marriage, our readers are already apprised. All the world knows how costly and beautiful was the bride's apparel, on this solemn occasion; and all the world knows that of the fairest of Eve's daughters, she occupies one of the first ranks. We shall simply make mention of a little episode which happened in those happy days, and which shows that the renowned Maria Fedarowna, the former Princess Dagmar of Denmark, is as good as she is fair.

As is known, Maria Fedarowna, had formerly been betrothed to the deceased Cesarvitch, brother to her present husband. As now lately accompanied by her royal consort, she walked through the magnificent halls of the winter palace at Petersburg, she unexpectedly met on the richly decorated walls, the life-size portrait of her departed lover. Overcome with emotion, she stopped—she trembled, and burst out in a flood of tears. All the courtiers were amazed, and feared for the result of this scene. But gently the Crown Prince approached his young weeping wife, with: "Weep on! weep on! for he deserved thy tears—we shall unitedly weep over him!"

These tears of Maria Fedarowna, adorn her more than all the glittering diamonds of her diadem.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY.

The following extracts are from a sermon by the Rev. C. D. Oliver, of the Montgomery Conference:

"One of the fathers, in speaking of the ministerial function, calls it a weight under which the shoulders of an angel might shrink. Holy men of old were mightily embarrassed in undertaking it. Jeremiah, who was sanctified from the womb, and ordained prophet to the nations, when he received his commission, cried out, 'Ah Lord God, I cannot speak for I am a child.'"

"Jonah when sent to Nineveh, timidly turned away in another direction. It is said of some in the ancient church, some too, eminent for piety and worth, that they were afraid of the greatness of this charge, and that they fled into mountains and into deserts, and hid themselves in dens and caverns, more afraid to be laid hands on by the Bishop, than by the most bloody persecutors. Three times did St. Ambrose flee from Milan. Gregory Nazianzen being taken in his flight and ordained by force, composed that excellent oration which is at the beginning of his works, in which he sets forth the greatness and danger of the ministry.

"St. Augustine entered by chance into the church of Hippo, just as the Bishop Valerius was speaking to the people, concerning the choice of a minister, of whom they stood in great need. He was presently pitched upon, and ordained, almost by force, after he had by tears deprecated the charge, and in these remarkable terms. 'What, do you wish that I should perish,' intimating the hazard he should thereby run. St. Chrysostom, professes of himself, that when he was chosen to a bishopric his soul and body was almost parted asunder, so great was the grief and fear that seized upon his spirit, and that he many times wondered how he ever entered into the minds of those who chose him; or of what grave offense that church had been guilty, which had provoked God to suffer it to be committed to such an unworthy person.

"Let no man venture upon the cure of souls, whose own soul has not realized the curative power of divine grace. Surely without this spiritual qualification, he who undertakes the work of the ministry, will find it a drudgery and a wearisomeness. And he will be a blind leader of the blind.' But, with it he can rejoice in being counted worthy to suffer for Christ's sake."

"We desire however to notice other qualifications important to this function. That there are many seeking to discharge it without being called of God, no one can question. The Scriptures are conclusive on this point. We remember reading of a young man, who after he had learned the trade of making brooms, 'studied divinity,' as it is called, and appeared for examination before a foreign Presbytery. He acquitted himself, so little to their satisfaction, that it was thought best to remand him back to his former vocation. A venerable man announced the decision in these words: 'Young man, it is the duty of all men to glorify God.' But he calls them to glorify Him in different ways, according to the gifts He bestows on them. Some He calls to glorify Him, by preaching the gospel of his Son, and others, by making brooms (brooms.) Now it is the unanimous judgment of this Presbytery, that he has not called you to the ministry, since he has not qualified you for it, and, therefore, it is your duty to go home to your father, and glorify God by decent industry in making brooms."

The candor and spirit of the old man, were admirable, and if the church was more largely pervaded by the same spirit, the cause of Christ would suffer far less detriment.

"While we would not throw discouragement in the way of, any truly called, and qualified of God for this office, yet, we feel constrained to declare it as our solemn conviction, that there are those who enter it, who would better glorify God by seeking other spheres of duty.

"Soundness of mind and judgment, should be united with spiritual qualification. Scripture requires aptitude in imparting instruction. 'Apt to teach.' This demands that one should be of good understanding. To be able to communicate readily proper information. He who is not apt to learn, can never be 'apt to teach,' and neither can be done without natural capacity. Talents and education must go together, and what we mean by talent, is good natural capacity. Talent will not do alone, for no talent can create facts, and without facts it has no materials, to work upon, and without discipline it will work wrong. Education does not create faculties, but calls them forth, trains them, and works with them. Natural capacity is the soil which education cultivates, and where she sows the seed of instruction. The age not only demands that the ministry should be full of faith, and the Holy Ghost, but full of useful knowledge; not only that it understand the language in which it speaks—its structure and the force of its words. But that it make it luminous with edifying and saving truth.

"It is often important that the minister should be a man of science, that he may stand forth in defence of evangelical religion. Infidelity has sought through the sciences to weaken and destroy the influence of the Bible over the popular mind. Not many years since, an anonymous book of very injurious tendency, was published, called the Vestiges of Creation. It displayed talents of no mean order, with a show of great scientific attainments. The author claimed thorough acquaintance with astronomy, zoology, and geology. In connection with a neat and pleasing style, there was great strength and boldness of affirmation. Moreover, it was written under the protest of a regard for religion, but its real design, which made it the more dangerous, was to invalidate the Mosaic account of the creation of the world, and thereby to bring the whole word of God into disrepute.

"It is well for christianity that she had in her ranks men of superior learning, and scientific skill, who were able to grapple with his sophistries, and to show the futility of his reasoning, and the inaccuracy of his statements, and to turn back his poisoned arrows upon his own head.

"It is desirable that a minister should be skilled in the original languages of the Old and New Testaments. Although our English translation is acknowledged to be excellent, yet it is not faultless, and a minister should be able to judge of its accuracy; and when commentators differ, to be able, by consulting the original, to arrive at an intelligent and satisfactory judgment for himself. He should be a scholar 'well instructed in the kingdom of God.' He should be able to employ every branch of knowledge which may serve to elucidate the Sacred Volume. The vast extension of physical science, of acquaintance with Eastern customs, and even of philosophy, within the last fifty years, has established a multitude of facts, and cleared up a multitude of obscurities; has rectified misrepresentations, and misinterpretations, which no integrity or perspicacity could once avoid, and has decisively refuted the objections of enemies. The process is going on, and must continue to go on. The minister should seek in every possible way, a thorough insight into the oracles of God. 'Let him,' says Bridges, 'exercise himself in them, day and night. Let him meditate in them. Let him live in them. Let him draw all his wisdom from them. Let him embrace nothing, religions which he does not find there. Let him not bind his faith to a man. Let his whole ground of faith be in God alone. For it is a divine, not a human faith, which we learn and teach; so pure that it can rest upon no ground, but the authority of God, who is never false, and can never deceive.'"

THOUGHTS ON PREACHING.

BY DR. D. W. ALEXANDER.

On Composing Sermons.—My father says a man should not begin with making a plan. 'Should not wait until he is in the vein,' Begin, however you feel, and write until you get into the vein, however long it be. 'Tis thus men do in mining. You may throw away all the beginnings. Men who write with ease, think best pen in hand. This applies to sermons, and also to books. It might be well to write a sermon currente calamo, and then begin again and write afresh (not copying, or even looking at the other,) but using all the lights struck out in the former exercise.

Formalism and Sermons.—Without flattering myself with the notion that I was ever eloquent, I am persuaded that the most effective discourses I ever delivered, were those for which I bade made the least regular preparation. I wish I could make sermons as if I had never heard or read how they were made by other people. The formalism of regular divisions and applications is deadly. And as to written sermons, what is written with weariness is heard with weariness.

Avoid Abstractions.—If you would keep up attention, avoid abstraction in your sermons, except those of mere argument. Come down from generals to specifications, and especially in individual cases. Wherever possible, give name and place, and intersperse with anecdote. By this means the Puritans, even when they were prolix, were vivacious. They subsidized every event of Old Testament history, and talked of David and Judas, instead of royalty and treason.

Off-hand Writing.—Write while you are warm. Do not be avaricious of your best thoughts, nor reserve your warm ideas for the last. This is like flooding the stomach of guests with soups before dinner. Much of Jay's excellence arises from this. If ever I have written anything acceptably, it has been with a free pen and from a full heart; not from compiled stores, though I have done much of the latter also.

Earnest Preaching.—The great reason why we have so little good preaching is, that we have so little piety. To be eloquent one must be in earnest; he must not only act as if he were in earnest, or try to be earnest, but be in earnest, or he cannot be effective. We have loud and vehement, we have smooth and graceful, we have splendid and elaborate preaching, but very little that is in earnest. One man who so feels for the souls of his hearers as to be ready to weep over them will assuredly make himself felt. This is what makes effective; he really feels what he says. This made Cookman eloquent. This especially was the charm of Sumnerfield above all men I ever heard. We must aim, therefore, at high degrees of warmth in our religious exercises, if we would produce an impression upon the public mind. Without an increase of our numbers, the very men we now have, if actuated with burning zeal for God, might work a mighty reformation in our country.

LOUISIANA.—On February 4th the Louisiana Legislature reported a bill calling for a State Convention to alter and amend the State Constitution. It provides that an election shall be held on the second Monday in April; and if the people decide in favor of the Convention, it shall assemble on the first Monday in May. The bill passed the House by a vote of more than four-fifths. Its passage by the Senate is considered certain, but it is expected that the Governor will veto it. Should he do so, the bill will pass by two-thirds.—Exchange.

Suspension During Impeachment.

This very point came up for consideration in the Convention which framed the Constitution, and it was decided in a way which dispels all doubt as to the intention of the convention. In that body, after it had been decided that some provision should be made for the impeachment and trial of the President in cases which should require it, there was great difference of opinion as to the tribunal by which the trial should be held; and it was only after considerable debate that the existing provision was adopted by which the House of Representatives should impeach, and the Senate try. After this had been decided, and during a revision of the whole, we find this record, made by Madison himself, and published in his report of the debates:

"Mr. Rutledge and Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved 'that persons impeached be suspended until they be tried and acquitted.'"

Mr. Madison—The President is made too dependent already on the legislature by the power of one branch to try him in consequence of an impeachment by the other. This intermediate suspension will put him in the power of one branch only. They can, at any moment, in order to make way for the function of another who will be more favorable to their views, vote a temporary removal of the existing magistrate. Mr. King concurred in the opposition to the amendment.

On the question to agree to it, the vote was:

Aye—Connecticut, South Carolina, Georgia—3.

No—New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina—8.

Thus it is perfectly clear, from the words of the Constitution, that Congress has no such express power of suspension as that now claimed for it by the radicals, and it is proved by the record that the convention absolutely refused to grant the power. It would almost seem as if the framers of the Constitution had foreseen just such attempts as that now contemplated by the violent radicals; and the provision could not be more distinct and specific than it is, if it had been addressed directly to the Thirty-Ninth Congress.—Crescent.

The Rival Padres.

In the year 1824 the performance of the usual acts of paratotal duty at Calcutta were divided between two priests, Padre Ward and Padre Shepherd, both tolerable musicians, and good singers, or chanters. Padre Shepherd had his regular turn in the service of the chapel, and Padre Ward performed the other duties, among which was the burial service.

The funeral-fee, fifteen rupees, was a sum that Padre Shepherd began to think not unworthy of being coveted, and he determined to snare the profits of that canonical duty. Accordingly, one day, he, with his surplice on and his book in his hand, watched the approach of a funeral, and perceiving, just as it was entering the churchyard, that Padre Ward had quitted his station to speak to one of the mourners, retired behind the gate, so that he might head the procession as it entered the consecrated ground. This he effected; and began to chant, "I am the resurrection and the life." The sonorous tones brought Padre Ward to the charge; when being the more abhorred as well as the more vociferous man of the two, he pushed the other aside, and without uttering a note of the chant, sang out "Viva the resurrection and the life! Yes, in the chapel; but here, I am the resurrection and the life." And then he proceeded with the service! This, however, he always considered as fifteen rupees rescued from imminent danger, and never afterwards quitted the head of a funeral procession, but stuck to his station, his book, and his notes.—Musical Gazette.

The greatest distance from the earth to the sun is 96,000,000 miles, and the least distance something over 94,000,000 miles. A saving of 2,000,000 of miles could be effected if a railroad should ever connect the two planets, by taking the least distance. This would shorten the time consumed in running and reduce the expenses very materially. Any railroad man will tell you that.

Lord Bacon beautifully said: "If a man be gracious to strangers, it shows he is a citizen of the world, and that his heart is no island cut off from other lands, but a continent that joins them."

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.
CHURCH MEMBERSHIP, REGENERATION, ETC.

NO. II.

Saint Paul complains of the Jews of his day, that "They being ignorant of God's righteous and going about to establish their own righteousness," were unwilling to submit to the "righteousness of God," or to the great plan of saving sinners, as instituted by him. To do and live, was to a great extent the opinion of many, in the days of the Apostles. This same belief has darkened the minds of many, even up to the present time. True, there are certain conditions that awakened, and penitent sinners must comply with, before they can be justified and regenerated. But no matter how far penitents may comply with these conditions, or how closely they may conform to the externals of religion, still if they fail to exercise an evangelical faith in the vicarious sacrifice of Christ, they cannot be justified, nor regenerated.

The term regeneration, the new birth, created anew, born again, born of the spirit, and born of God, are all synonymous terms. When, therefore, we speak of regeneration, we mean that change in man, expressed in the Scriptures, by such terms as has just been quoted.

Regeneration stands closely connected with, but at the same time distinct from justification and adoption. Mr. Wesley says, "that justification relates to that great work which God does for us; in forgiving our sins; and that regeneration relates to the great work which God does in us: in renewing our fallen nature. In order of time, neither of these is before the other, in the moment, we are justified by the grace of God; we are also, born of the Spirit; but in order of thinking, as it is termed, justification precedes the new birth. We first conceive his wrath to be turned away, and then his spirit to work in our hearts."

Mr. Watson says, in reference to justification, regeneration, and adoption, "that they occur at the same time, and all enter into the experience of the same person, so that no man is justified without being regenerated and adopted."

To these quotations it may be added; that as justification is a work wrought for us by the power of God, without any agency on our part, further than that of the exercise of faith; so, regeneration is a work wrought in us by the Holy Ghost, for we are informed in the Gospel, by St. John, that "as many as received him (Christ,) to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name, which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God."

Notwithstanding the plain teaching of the Scriptures, relative to regeneration, there are a diversity of opinions in the world relative to it. In the early ages of the church, and very soon after the days of the apostles, water-baptism was called regeneration, because by that act, candidates for baptism made a public acknowledgment of their allegiance to Christ; and further, because water-baptism was designed to represent the baptism of the Holy Ghost, by whom, the work of regeneration is effected. This use of the term, however, soon led to gross errors in the church. Some of the fathers who were orthodox on other points, maintained that regeneration was nothing more than baptism by water; that every person duly baptized is born again, and that no other regeneration is to be expected in this world. The Romish Church still holds on to this error. Also many of the leading divines of the church of England, and some of the high churchmen of the United States. A modern Theologian of England, uses the following language. "The word regeneration is in the Scriptures, solely and exclusively applied to the one immediate effect of baptism once administered, and is never used synonymously to the repentance or reformation of Christians, or to express any operation of the Holy Ghost upon the human mind subsequent to baptism."

One of the Tractarians of the Puseyite school in England says, "That in baptism a supernatural grace is conferred—a new principle put into us—a new principle of life and action, even the Spirit of grace, the sanctification of the spirit, which makes us heirs of salvation, and entitles us to eternal life;" and this he adds, "extends to every one, to whom baptism is rightly administered, and that no other regeneration is possible in this world."

A modern divine of our own country, noted for his learning, and with many as a Divine, taught publicly from the pulpit, and with his pen, "that water-baptism is essential for the remission of sins, and that the Scriptures do not authorize us to expect the forgiveness of our sins without baptism." His language on this point is emphatic—He says, "as water saved Noah, so baptism saved us." Again, "we leave our sins, where Noah's baptism left the ungodly." I once heard a minister, or as he was denominated, Evangelist, and who had embraced the same doctrine, relative to water-baptism, proclaim from the pulpit, "That it was an abomination to God for an unbaptized person to pray to him—that God would not hear the prayer of an unbaptized man."

Such doctrines are not only unscriptural, but highly dangerous to the souls of men, leading them to rest in a form of godliness, and preventing them from seeking the influence of the Holy Ghost, to which the Scriptures ascribe everything that is truly good in an experience of grace and practice.

The meaning of the word regenerate, as given by lexicographers, is to reproduce or make anew—to form into a new or better state. To renew or charge the heart by implanting holy affections in it. A change of heart by the Holy Ghost from enmity to God, to love and obedience; and these definitions are in accordance with the teaching of the New Testament, and are confirmatory of the great truth that regeneration can only be effected by the Holy Ghost. But, says the objector, did not Christ teach Nicodemus, that "except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." Dr. Clark, on this verse says, "Though baptism by water into the Christian faith, was necessary to every Jew and Gentile that entered into the kingdom of the Messiah, it is not necessary, that by water and the spirit, (in this place,) we should understand two different things: it is probably only an elliptical form of speech, for the Holy Spirit under the similitude of water; as, in Math iii, 3, the Holy Ghost and fire, do not mean two things, but one, viz., the Holy Ghost under the similitude of fire."

But a question arises here, can a man when born of the Spirit, born of God, made a new creature, have an internal, experimental knowledge of the fact? To the law and the testimony, then for an answer, in the first Epistle of John IV, 13, he says, "Hereby know we that we dwell in Him, and He in us, because He hath given us of his Spirit," and then V. 10, "He that believeth on the son of God, hath the witness in himself." St. Paul says, (Gal. IV. 6.) "And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." And in Rom. VIII, 16, we read, "For ye have not received the Spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself, beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God."

The definition of the new birth, or regeneration as given by Christ to Nicodemus, also teaches us, that the regenerated man may have an experimental knowledge that he is made a new creature.

"The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit."

As to the manner in which the Holy Ghost effects the great work of regeneration, there is a mystery, that the mind of man will never be able to unfold, at least in this world. Still, though unseen, this new creation is effected by the Holy Spirit. The wind too, produces powerful effects and great changes; and although we can understand more about it than it is possible for us to know about the Holy Ghost: still, we cannot see it, but we can feel its effects, and know for ourselves that it does blow. And thanks be to God, we can feel and know when the Holy Spirit moves upon our hearts, and tells us by an inward impression that we are born of God.

Such persons then as have this witness of the Spirit—that they have passed from death unto life, and can joyfully sing

"How happy every child of grace, Who knows his sins forgiven," we mark on the roll of members in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, as BELIEVERS.

THE REV. DR. PALMER ON DANCING.

We give several paragraphs from a sermon which was preached in this city, by this able Divine, upon the subject of dancing, in the month of June last, and which appears in full in the "Christian Commonwealth."

"It is argued that dancing is not wrong in the abstract. Granted; but what if it be wrong in the concrete? It is not sinful per se; but what if it be sinful in its inseparable adjuncts? The fallacy is so transparent here, the only wonder is that it should ever deceive; nor would it upon any but a moral question, in regard to which we wish to be deceived. It may be affirmed of all corporeal actions, that, in themselves considered, or in the abstract, they are wholly indifferent and devoid of moral character. We may attach very little importance to the plucking and eating of an apple; yet the apple which Adam eat in Paradise, contrary to the command of God, "brought death into the world and all our woe." There is no sin in the mere act of swallowing a glass of brandy; yet if "the thief put into the mouth steals away my brain," the abstract is soon changed into the concrete. Nay, more: If this subtle drink should not imbrute me, yet if my indulgence causes a weak brother to stumble, this indifferent action assumes the form of a high misdemeanor. A cruel disregard of the sins and frailties of our fellow-men imparts a turpitude to acts otherwise incapable either of praise or blame."

But, it will be asked, does this rigid Puritanism allow no relaxation? Must the soul of man never enjoy the poor privilege of the archer's bow, that of being sometimes relieved from the tension of duty? Unquestionably it may. But are there no pleasures, both grateful and bracing, strengthening while they refresh, that we must resort to the dance, the most brainless amusement under heaven? Let us not so impeach a bountiful Providence, whose open hand has sown blessings and comforts in all the thickets of care. The cooling fountains of water, which bubble up under our feet in merciful profusion on every hill-side, refresh the fainting spirit more than all the wine presses of Madeira. In like manner, the unrestrained communion and the healthful sports of childhood have a relish in them, in comparison with which all the forced and precocious pleasures of the drawing-room appear sickly and tame. And when, in opening manhood, the young begin to court society, and to feel the buddings of sentiment and tenderness which are to sweeten life to its last drop, is there no intercourse for them around the fireside—no room for the heart to play in the social visit paid to friends and neighbors? Are there no kindly gatherings overlooked by the eye of parental love, and over which even religion may throw its sacred protection? Must these be all jostled out of place to make room for the crowded assembly, the masquerade, and the dance? Must the young mope to death, unless they find refuge in boisterous mirth—in a babel of confused sounds—among noisy revellers, whose hearts and brains alike have slipped down to heel? Without expanding, however, this principle will be admitted to be sound: the diversions of the young—and in nothing is the wisdom of a pious parent more heavily taxed than in providing these—should be selected from that class which entertain only so long as they are needful for the purpose of relaxation. There are wholesome pleasures, which, like wholesome food, are never craved but when it is proper to enjoy them. And there are pleasures which intoxicate and madden, set the blood on flame, and consume while they delight. The dance is of this latter kind—it fascinates with a peculiar charm, and hurries its votaries along with a wild delirium; too much intoxicated to perform the sober duties of life, and too far maddened, to heed the warnings prophetic of their speedy ruin.

It is time now to put the weights into the other scale. I will reduce all that I have to say against social dancing among Christians under three heads.

1. It is inconsistent with that separation from the world which is involved in a profession of religion. The history of the Church abundantly shows that she can more safely abide the ordeal of persecution than of prosperity. The days have been when the world was anxious to draw the line of demarcation between itself and the Church. All men were compelled to the unambiguous choice between the two. Then a profession of religion was seldom made before the east was counted; the sacrifices made to enter the Church were but the earnest of sacrifices cheerfully rendered as soon as they were demanded. The Church, compact and homogenous by pressure from without exerted, through her separation, a tenfold greater influence than in after times when her numbers were quintupled.

How many assume the solemn obligations of Church members under transient emotions, without any abiding conviction of the sins they profess to abandon, or real love for the service to which they addict themselves! The covetous love of gain—the ambitious love of applause—coldness in religious duties—Worldly-mindedness—levity—much of these may be mourned over; but, being to a great extent covert, they cannot be corrected by men except through moral and persuasive means. But, in regard to pleasures, the line may perhaps be more visibly drawn. It is true that minute precepts are not given to guide us in the particular selection of amusements. The method which God pursues is better adapted to form and strengthen the character of his saints; the Holy Ghost implants right affections in the heart, which are to guide with the unerring truthfulness of spiritual instincts, and prescribes general principles, which are to be gathered from the Scriptures and applied at discretion. However difficult it may be in these to draw the line between the lawful and unlawful pleasures of the Christian, with the heart right towards God, and with a conscience informed by the Divine Word, it can never be difficult in practice. But I propose no hair-splitting distinctions—there is one principle, obvious and tangible, which resolves perfectly the point before us. If there are pleasures which the world, alienated from God, has stamped and chosen as its own; pleasures which peculiarly express the vanity and darkness of the natural mind; pleasures which bind men as ungodly together in fellowship and sympathy—from these pleasures professing Christians must wholly abstain, if they would "keep their garments unspeckled from the world."

Now the dance, the opera, the theatres the race course, et id omne genus fall exactly into this category. They have been appropriated by "the lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God," as their peculiar portion—they bear the stamp of the mint in which they have been coined—they are acknowledged badges of a worldly profession, and, in some sort, sacraments of allegiance to the Prince of the power of the air.—We just as naturally infer that one who mingles in them is worldly in his tastes and pursuits, as that one who goes to the Lord's Table is a professed follower of Jesus. In this aspect of the case then, however perplexed we may be in framing a general and positive rule, which shall discriminate all the lawful amusements of the Christian, we have no difficulty in reaching a negative decision upon the dance and the pleasures cognate with it. Brethren, "I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils; ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils; ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's Table and of the table of devils."

2. The baptized children of the Church cannot be indulged in dancing consistently with baptismal vows. Much that has been already said will apply here. In brief, then, what are these vows? In baptism we give our children to God, and invoke upon them His dreadful name; can we consecrate them anew upon the high altars of the world? In baptism we recognize the covenant which binds families to Him who is the author of our redemption; and in token of this, its broad seal is placed upon the foreheads of our offspring, can we rescind the solemn stipulations of that covenant, and absolve our children from the duties which it imposes? In baptism, as the sureties of our children, we profess faith in the promises of God, and, in their behalf, confess the sinful nature which they inherit through us; do these confessions and this faith consist with a purpose to allow them wilfully to sin, any more than our confessions for ourselves comport with purposes to sin on our own part?

Indeed, so deeply impressed is my own mind with the inconsistency of dancing with baptismal obligations. I hesitate not to utter my mature conviction, that members of the Church who consent to the dancing of their children are perfectly unable to the discipline of God's house, on the ground of their breach of vows.

I come now to the last position, from which some of you will probably recoil;

3. That promiscuous dancing between the sexes is essentially voluptuous and demoralizing.

In bringing this discourse to a close, I trust, my brethren, you will do me the justice to believe that it has not been easy for me to say all that I have uttered. But we are hurrying to the judgment bar, and there is no time for soft and honeyed phrases, when your souls and the souls of your children are at stake. Endeared as my relations are to you, I would cheerfully close this Bible never again to open it, and, like the Spartan law-giver, go into perpetual exile from this pulpit, if this step would stamp these instructions ineffaceably upon your hearts. There is no curse with which a righteous God can afflict this prostrate earth equal to that of an unconverted, unsanctified, pleasure-loving Church. Better that the plow of desecration should turn up the bones of our common dead in that graveyard; better that the whirlwind of God's anger should destroy this temple, in which you and your fathers have worshipped; better that blasting and mildew should make this consecrated spot a terrible monument of the divine displeasure; better that we should now be summoned, as we sit together on these seats, to meet at once our last account than that we should live a cold, dead Church, sending forth our blighting influence upon the ungodly around us. Remember, an important part of our testimony is the witness we bear for experimental religion. Let not pastors, elders, and people, enter into an unholy conspiracy to betray Christ through his cause. Let us "have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." Let us "walk honestly as in the day; not in chambering and wantonness; not in rioting and drunkenness; not in strife and envying." "Let us make no provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof;" but rather, let us "live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present evil world, denying all ungodliness and worldly lusts;" "looking for and hastening unto the day of God, when the Son of Man shall be revealed to be glorified in his saints." And to "as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them and mercy, and upon the Israel of God."

SURGEON IN LONDON.

Distant observers who read of the crimes of such places as London and New York, are prone to think of them as without a relieving feature; whereas, in point of fact, one extreme is usually attended by the other, and the piety which exists side by side with abounding wickedness, like trees exposed to mountain winds, must take strong hold in order to stand at all.

I have seen this of late in London. A devotional fervor and religious activity of a very edifying character have come to my notice. A meeting of ministers, deacons, and elders, held the first Monday of November at Commercial-street Chapel, and which was largely attended, was distinguished by a degree of devotional fervor which I have rarely seen in America. It was presided over by Rev. Mr. Brock, assisted by Rev. Messrs. Spurgeon and Stovel. It was a full house of select auditors all very serious men, who had purchased a good degree and great boldness in the faith. There was little speaking, none I believe except in connection with select portions of Scripture, with which each one began his remarks. The time from ten to five, was chiefly devoted to prayer, terminating with the Lord's Supper, in which service the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel took part. No prompting was necessary, the voluntary offerings equaling the opportunity to present them. The whole assembly was moved by a common impulse. There were on all sides suppressed groans, cries, and tears. It was a sighing and crying after God. One venerable man's utterance in prayer was so obstructed by emotion that he could scarcely proceed, and all seemed to feel

How sweet and awful was the place,
With Christ within the doors;
While everlasting love displays
The clearest of her stores.

Greatly increased activity is visible in some of the Churches, and frequent accessions are made to their number. A general assurance seems to be felt that they cannot labor in vain in the Lord. Mr. Spurgeon's people are a remarkable example of this assurance. He has added to his Church the past year between three and four hundred, and last Sabbath announced that fifty-two were awaiting admission during the present week. The success of this man depends upon his simple faith in Gospel instrumentalities, and the power with which the Holy Spirit honors his unstudied and unpretending messages. There is an utter abandon in his manner, as if it were of no account what his hearers thought or said of him, or whether he appeared as an intellectual and eloquent man or otherwise. For discrimination and power of thought the sermons I have heard from him the past two Sabbaths fall far below those I usually hear from Henry Ward Beecher, but still they are delivered with greater directness, and confidence of immediate results in the conversion of sinners. In this respect they are more in the strain of Rev. Jacob Knapp, the revivalist. I speak only of the sermons I have heard; no doubt he rises on other occasions to a much higher pitch of intellectual power.

Mr. Spurgeon's efficiency lies in a quarter where his American admirers least suspect. It is in his administrative ability. His power to do, and make others do, probably exceeds that of any man in England. He preached twice on the Sabbath to seven thousand people, and administer to them the Lord's Supper; (or he has done so the past two Sabbaths); has a prayer-meeting in his church every morning and evening; has baptism two evenings of the week; lectures, I am told, somewhere, about every day; manages a theological seminary of one hundred students, for whose subsistence he chiefly provides; publishes a monthly magazine, and one sermon every week; has just issued a hymn book; is about establishing an orphan asylum; manages a Church of 3,000 or 4,000 members; makes frequent journeys to preach abroad; and how many more enterprises he has on hand I know not.

Of course he has to do much of this work through the agency of others, keeping two clerks to do his writing, twenty or thirty deacons, I believe, to do the pastoral visiting and other work, a corps of theological teachers, and other co-operators, upon all of whom he has the faculty of so impressing himself as to direct their work and be the animating soul of the whole movement. It is said that a commercial firm of London were so impressed with his administrative ability, that they offered him fifteen thousand dollars a year to embark his influences in their enterprise. He can so infuse his own spirit into others as to make them at one with himself in his peculiar lines of labor and activity. Since John Wesley no one has probably evinced this peculiar gift in an equal degree. He has no ambition, however, for sectarian leadership, and has been specially active and watchful in uniting his own denomination and evangelical Christians generally.

There is nothing in Mr. Spurgeon's person to indicate his career. In a crowd, one would pick out hundreds as apparently better fitted for his work. He is short, chubby, with distended cheeks and apoplectic neck, receding forehead, and other characteristics of person setting at defiance the doctrines of phrenology. His voice, though clear, and well suited to be heard by a multitude, lacks variety, depth and pathos, and has in some cases a wiry twang, which is by no means specially captivating. Both the sermons I heard from him were evidently the suggestions of the moment, without previous study or preparation. There was no keeping up of attention by the connection and dependence of parts, such as is deemed necessary in the perfection of oratory, but a continuous talking sort of appeal to the conscience of his hearers. Such is indeed the character of preaching here generally, though Mr. Spurgeon is sufficiently unlike that of others to keep up attention, and secure for him from Sabbath to Sabbath the largest congregation of any minister in the world. How it would affect the more intellectual class of our American hearers, judging of it apart from divine influence, is a question, by no means clear to my mind. Here there is a singular adaptation between the preaching and its hearers.

An artificial ivory is now made in France from a paste of papier-mache and gelatine, and to which the name of Parisian marble is given. Among other things, the finest and most complicated mouldings for ceilings can be made, or capitals of columns can be constructed in any color. It is said to be hard, durable and elastic.

MR. GEORGE PEABODY'S MUNIFICENT DONATION TO THE CAUSE OF EDUCATION IN THE SOUTH.

In the execution of a favorite scheme of public beneficence, Mr. George Peabody, whose riches have been lavishly but judiciously bestowed in numerous acts of real charity, two days ago, addressed the following letter to the gentlemen named:

To Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts; Hon. Hamilton Fish, of New York; Right Rev. Charles P. McVaine, of Ohio; General U. S. Grant, of the United States Army; Hon. William C. C. Evans, of Virginia; Hon. John H. Clifford, of Massachusetts; Hon. Wm. Allen, of South Carolina; William M. Everts, Esq., of New York; Hon. William A. Graham, of North Carolina; Charles Macalester, Esq., of Pennsylvania; George W. Riggs, Esq., of Washington; Samuel Wetmore, Esq., of New York; Edward A. Bradford, Esq., of Louisiana; George N. Eaton, Esq., of Maryland; and George Peabody Russell, Esq., of Massachusetts.

Gentlemen—I beg to address you on a subject which occupied my mind long before I left England, and in regard to which one, at least, of you (the Hon. Mr. Winthrop, the distinguished and valued friend to whom I am so much indebted for cordial sympathy, careful consideration and wise counsel in this matter) will remember that I consulted him immediately upon my arrival in May last.

I refer to the educational needs of those portions of our beloved and common country which have suffered from the destructive ravages, and the not less disastrous consequences of civil war.

With my advancing years my attachment to my native land has not become more devoted. My hope and faith in its success and glorious future has grown brighter and stronger, and now, looking forward beyond my stay on earth, as may be permitted to one who has passed the limit of three score and ten years, I see our country united and prosperous, emerging from the clouds which still surround her, taking a higher rank among the nations, and becoming richer and more powerful than ever before.

But to make her prosperity more than superficial, her moral and intellectual development should keep pace with her material growth, and in those portions of our nation to which I have referred, the urgent and pressing physical needs of an almost impoverished people must for some years preclude them from making, by unaided effort, such advances in education and such progress in the diffusion of knowledge among all classes as every lover of his country must earnestly desire.

I feel most deeply, therefore, that it is the duty and privilege of the more favored and wealthy portions of our nation to assist those who are less fortunate, and, with the wish to discharge so far as I may be able my own responsibility in this matter, as well as to gratify my desire to aid those to whom I am bound by so many ties of attachment and regard, I give you, gentlemen, most of whom have been my personal and especial friends, the sum of one million of dollars, to be by you and your successors held in trust, and the income thereof used and applied in your discretion for the promotion and encouragement of intellectual, moral or industrial education among the young of the more destitute portions of the Southern and Southwestern States of our Union; my purpose being that the benefits intended shall be distributed among the entire population, without other distinction than their needs and the opportunities of usefulness to them.

Besides the income thus derived, I give to you permission to use from the principal sum, within the next two years, an amount not exceeding forty per cent.

In addition to this gift I place in your hands bonds of the State of Mississippi, issued to the Planters' Bank, and commonly known as Planters' Bank bonds, amounting with interest, to about eleven hundred thousand dollars, the amount realized by you, from which is to be added to and used for the purposes of this trust.

These bonds were originally issued in payment for stock in that bank held by the State, and amounted in all to only two millions of dollars. For many years the State received large dividends from that bank over and above the interest on these bonds. The State paid the interest without interruption till 1840, since which no interest has been paid; except a payment of about one hundred thousand dollars, which was found in the treasury applicable to the payment of the coupons, and paid by a mandamus of the Supreme Court. The validity of these bonds has never been questioned, and they must not be confounded with another issue of bonds made by the State to the Union Bank, the recognition of which has been a subject of controversy with a portion of the population of Mississippi.

Various acts of legislation, viz: of February 28, 1842; February 23, 1844; February 10, 1846; February 28, 1846; March 4, 1848, and the highest judicial tribunal of the State have confirmed their validity, and I have no doubt that at an early day such legislation will be had as to make these bonds available in increasing the usefulness of the present trust.

Mississippi, though how depressed, is rich in agricultural resources, and cannot long disregard the moral obligation resting upon her to make provision for their payment. In confirmation of what I have said in regard to the legislative and judicial action concerning the State bonds issued to the Planters' Bank, I herewith place in your hands the documents marked A.

The details and organization of the trust I leave with you, only requesting that Mr. Winthrop may be chairman, and Governor Fish and Bishop McVaine vice chairmen of your body. And I give to you power to make all necessary by laws and regulations, to obtain an act of incorporation if any shall be found expedient, to provide for the expenses of the trustees and of any agents appointed by them, and generally to do all such acts as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this trust.

All vacancies occurring in your number, by death, resignation, or otherwise, shall be filled by your election, as soon as conveniently may be, and having in view an equality of representation so far as regards the Northern and Southern States.

I furthermore give to you the power, in case two-thirds of the trustees shall at any time after the lapse of thirty years deem it expedient, to close this trust, and of the funds which at that time shall be in the hands of yourselves and your successors, to distribute not less than two-thirds among such educational purposes, as you and they may determine in the states for whose benefit the income is now appointed to be used. The remainder may be distributed by the trustees for educational or literary purposes wherever they may deem it expedient.

In making this gift, I am aware that the fund derived from it can but aid the States which I wish to benefit in their own exertions to diffuse the blessings of education and morality. But if this endowment shall encourage those now anxious for the light of knowledge, and stimulate to new efforts the many good and noble men who cherish the high purpose of placing our great country foremost, and not only in power, but in the intelligence and virtue of her citizens, it will have accomplished all that I can hope.

With reverent recognition of the need of the blessing of Almighty God upon this gift, and with the fervent prayer that under his guidance your counsels may be directed for the highest good of present and future generations in our beloved country, I am, gentlemen, with great respect, your humble servant.

GEORGE PEABODY.

Washington, Feb. 7, 1867.

Upon the receipt of this letter by Hon. B. C. Winthrop, a meeting of the trustees named therein was called by him at Willard's Hotel. There were present: Hon. R. C. Winthrop, the Right Rev. Bishop R. McVaine, Gen. Grant, Gov. Aiken, Messrs. William M. Everts, C. Macalester, Geo. W. Riggs, Samuel Wetmore, George N. Eaton, and George Peabody Russell. To these gentlemen Mr. Winthrop submitted the letter of Mr. Peabody. Remarks were made by several of those who were present upon the munificence of the gift, the great-hearted patriotism of the donor, and the incalculable good that might be accomplished by the means thus entrusted to their use.

Governor Aiken, of South Carolina, attempted to speak on the subject, but was so much overcome by his emotion that he was unable to proceed. The following resolutions were offered by Bishop McVaine and adopted by the trustees:

THE RESOLUTIONS.

WHEREAS our honored countryman and friend, George Peabody, has, in a letter just communicated to the undersigned, made known his determination, out of a grateful sense of manifold goodness with which God has prospered his life, and of an earnest desire to promote the best interests of his fellow-citizens, to devote a munificent donation of property for certain most wise and beneficent uses, indicated in said letter, and has requested us to take in trust the charge and management of the same; therefore,

Resolved, That the undersigned, being the trustees assembled in Washington, deeply sensible of the honor conferred on them by a trust of such eminent importance and responsibility, and realizing their dependence upon the guidance and blessing of God to be enabled to discharge its duties with such wisdom and faithfulness as may best secure the benevolent designs of the gift, do hereby accept the office of trustees of the same, and promise our best exertions in its behalf.

Resolved, That we hereby express to Mr. Peabody our grateful appreciation of the enlarged and unprecedented generosity which, after having bestowed upon the poor of the city of London, a bounty that drew forth the admiration of Europe, and after having exceeded the same in his recent return to his native land in benefactions to institutions of learning in the Middle and Eastern States of the Union, has now crowned the whole with this last deed of patriotism and loving kindness so eminently calculated to bind together the several parts of our beloved country in the best bonds of mutual well doing and regard.

Resolved, That we express to Mr. Peabody our respectful and affectionate prayer that in the gracious providence of our Heavenly Father his valuable life may be spared to witness the success of his benevolent contributions to the happiness of his fellow-citizens in all parts of his native and beloved land, and that many of those whom God has blessed with large possessions may be induced to follow his example of wise and noble employment of wealth for the good of man and the glory of God.

After the adoption of the resolutions, Bishop McVaine offered up an eloquent prayer for the success of the enterprise thus inaugurated by the patriotism, public spirit and true Christian philanthropy of the generous originator of the design for the advancement of that portion of our country, now prostrated and desolated by the ravages of war.

An organization of the trustees was effected, with Mr. R. C. Winthrop, chairman; Bishop McVaine and Hamilton Fish, Esq., as vice-chairmen, and George Peabody Russell as secretary, and the committees necessary for the speedy inauguration of the executions of the provisions of the trust were appointed.

It is hardly necessary to speak of the character of the gentlemen who have thus been selected as the almoners of this munificent benevolence. Many of their names are already historic as shining lights of patriotic endeavor, public usefulness and private excellence. All are men of noble qualities of head and heart, and unimpeachable integrity. They are just such men as our like Mr. George Peabody would select for this purpose, with the confident assurance that the trust reposed in them would be faithfully executed.

THE ROCKY MOUNTAIN PARKS.

Less than a hundred miles west of Denver, and reaching from north to south through four or five degrees of latitude, are four of the most singular and beautiful valleys to be found on the globe. They are known by the names of the North Park, the Middle Park, the South Park, and the San Luis Park. The first three are each nearly as large as the State of Connecticut; the last about the same area as the State of Massachusetts. They all bear the same general features—rich, smooth prairie valleys, about six thousand feet above the level of the sea, and surrounded on all sides by stupendous and rugged mountains, some of the snow-clad peaks of which are nearly ten thousand feet higher. The form of each is an irregular square, approaching that of oval or circular. The atmosphere of these parks is probably the most salubrious in the world, and so pure, that the carcass of a large animal, such as an ox or a buffalo, may be hung up, without salt, in the open air, at any season, and dried, without undergoing the slightest taint, and so pellucid, that a small object, such as a horse, can be seen, with the aid of a good glass, from the mountains, in any part of these extended grassy and flowery plains.

It is believed that the Pacific Railway, which is now rapidly progressing toward Denver, through the valley of the Kansas, will, in its progress through the mountains, pass through the Middle Park; and that it will not be longer than 1870, until this grand, beautiful and health-imparting spot may be reached by tourists in search of soul-elevating pleasures, or of bodily health, by an easy and rapid journey by rail, over the fairest region of this continent.

With these remarks, I introduce the following extracts from an eloquent description of the San Luis Park, which is the most southern of the range, from the pen of Governor Gilpin, of Colorado. This Park, which he describes, lies partly in Colorado and partly in New Mexico—is larger than any of the others; but is like them in general features. In this Park, or rather, in the mountain range which forms its northern boundary, the Rio Grande has its source.

I now quote from Gov. Gilpin's description. After giving a minute description of the mountains and streams of the Park, and the San Luis Lake, which is situated in the northern part, Gov. Gilpin proceeds:

"The San Luis Park is a nameless elliptical bowl, the bed of a primeval sea which has been drained; its bottom, smooth as a water surface and concave, is 9,400 square miles in area. It is watered by thirty-five mountain streams, which descending from the encircling crest of snow, converge, nineteen into the San Luis Lake, the rest into the Rio del Norte. An extraordinary symmetry of configuration is its prominent feature. The scenery, everywhere sublime, has the ever-changing variety of the Kaleidoscope. Entirely around the edge of the plain, and closing the junction of the plain with the mountain foot, runs a smooth, glacis, exactly resembling the sea beach, which accompanies the conjunction of the land with the ocean. From this beach rise continuously all around the horizon, the great mountains, elevating their heads above the line of perpetual snow. On the eastern side, the escarpment of the Cordillera rises rapidly, and is abrupt; on the western side the crest of the Sierra Mimbres is more remote, having the interval filled with ridges, lessening in altitude as they descend to the plain of the Park. This continuous shelving flank of the Sierras, completing a perfect amphitheatre, has a superficial area equal to that of the level plain which it envelops, and gives to the whole inclosure within the encircling band of snow, an area of 18,000 square miles. At an elevation of five or six thousand feet above the plain, a level line upon the mountain wall marks the cessation of arborescence, above which naked granite and snow alone are seen. To one who ascends to this elevation, at any point, the whole interior of this prodigious amphitheatre is scanned by the eye and swept in a single glance. Aided by the glass, the smallest objects scattered over the immense elliptical area beneath are discernible through the limpid, brilliant and translucent atmosphere. Two facts impress themselves upon the senses: the perfect symmetry of configuration in nature and the immense variety in the forms and splendor of the landscape. The colors of the sky and atmosphere are intensely vivid and gorgeous; the dissolving tints of light and shade are forever interchanging; they are of infinite as are the altering angle of the solar rays in the diurnal circuit."

The average elevation of the plain above the sea level is 6,400 feet. The highest peaks have an altitude of 16,000 feet above the sea. In the serrated rim of the park, as seen from the plain, projected against the canopy, are discernible seventeen peaks, at very equal distance, one from another. Each one differs from all the rest in some particular of shape and position. Each one identifies itself by some striking beauty. From the snows of each one descends some considerable river, as well within the park as outward down the external mountain back.

There is an identity between the "Valley or Park of the city of Mexico," and the San Luis Park, which ought to be here mentioned. They are similar, twin basins of the great plateau, classifying together and alike in the physical structure of the continent. Mexico is in latitude 20 degrees, longitude 99 degrees, and at 7,500 of altitude. The width of the continent is here 595 miles (from ocean to ocean), and the divergence of the cordilleras is 275 miles, which is here the width of the plateau. At 39 degrees the continent expands to a width of 3,500 miles between the oceans; the cordilleras have diverged 1,200 miles asunder, and the plateau has widened the same dimensions. In harmony with this great expansion of the continent are all the details of its interior structure. The "Park of the city of Mexico" is but one-tenth in size and grandeur, as compared and contrasted with the San Luis Park. Of identical anatomy, the former is a pigmy; the latter a giant. The similitude, as component parts of the mountain anatomy, is in all respects absolute; as is also true of the other parks, which occupy longitudinally the centre of the State of Colorado.

METEOROLOGY.—The atmospheric condition of the San Luis Park, like its scenery, is one of constant brilliancy, both by day and night, obeying steady laws, yet alternating with a kind of playfully methodical fickleness. There are no prolonged vernal or autumnal seasons. Summer and winter divide the year. Both are characterized by mildness of temperature. After the autumnal equinox, the snow begins to accumulate upon the mountains. After the vernal equinox, they dissolve. The formation of light clouds upon the crest of the sierras is incessant. The meridian sun retains its vitalizing heat around the year; at midnight prevails a corresponding tonic coolness. The clouds are wafted away by the steady atmospheric currents coming from the west. They rarely interrupt the sunshine, but refracting his rays, hiding the canopy with a shining silver light, at once intense and brilliant. The atmosphere and climate are essentially continental, being winter-raptedly salubrious, brilliant and tonic.

The flanks of the great mountains, bathed by the embrace of these irrigating clouds, are clad with dense forests of pine, fir, spruce, hemlock, aspen, oak, cedar, pinon, and a variety of smaller fruit trees and shrubs, which protect the sources of springs and running rivulets; among the forests are alternate mountain meadows of luxuriant and nutritious grasses. The ascending clouds, rarely condensed, furnish little irrigation at the depressed elevation of the plains, which are destitute of timber, but clothed in grass. These delicate grasses, growing rapidly during the annual melting of the snows, cure into hay as the aridity of the atmosphere returns. They form perennial pastures, and supply the winter food of the aboriginal cattle, everywhere indigenous and abundant.

An infinite variety of temper and temperature is suggested as flowing from the close juxtaposition of extreme altitudes and depressions, permanent snows, running rivers, and the concentric courses of the mountains and the rivers. Storms of rain and wind are neither frequent nor lasting. The air is uniformly dry, having a very racy freshness and exhilarating taste. A soothing serenity is the prevailing impression of those who live perpetually exposed to the seasons. Mud is never anywhere or at any time seen. Moderation and concord appear to result from the presence and contact of elements so various.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

YEAST.—As much of the success of bread making depends upon the yeast used, and as home-made yeast is usually better than baker's, every housekeeper should make her own yeast. For hop yeast take a handful of hops and put it in three quarts of water; boil it half an hour. Then wet a pint of flour with cold water, rubbing all the lumps out; put into a large pan and strain the water in which the hops were boiled upon it. When it is quite cool put a cup of yeast in it; put it in a jug, and set it in a warm place till it rises. Then put it in a cool place. This will keep a month. When it is nearly gone make a new quantity, taking the remainder of the old yeast to raise it with.

MOLASSES CANDY.—One quart of West India molasses, half a pound of brown sugar, the juice of one lemon. Put the molasses in a kettle with the sugar, boil it over a slow, steady fire till it is done, which you can easily tell by dropping a little in cold water, if done it will be crisp, if not, it will be stringy. A good way to judge if it is boiled enough is to let it boil till it stops bubbling. Stir it very frequently, and just before it is taken off the fire add the lemon juice. Butter a shallow tin pan, and pour it in to get cold. Molasses candy may be flavored with lemon, and add roasted ground nuts or almonds blanched.

BOILED LEG OF LAMB.—Trim off all the loose fat, cut off the shank, wash and wipe it dry; dredge it with flour and tie it in a clean cloth; put it in boiling water enough to cover it. The water should be salted in the proportion of two teaspoonfuls of salt to a quart of water. Let it boil from two to three hours, according to its size. Serve it with drawn butter or rich parsley sauce, whichever may be preferred, and vegetables of any kind which may be in season.

GINGER SNAPS.—One pint of Molasses, one teaspoonful of salaratus, half a teaspoon of ginger, butter size of an egg, flour enough to make it roll very thin. Cut the cakes with a tin ring, and bake quickly.

PARSNIPS.—Scrape and wash your parsnips and put them on with just enough water to boil them and no more; when they are done they should be nearly dry. Then dish them and pour over melted butter and a little salt or some drawn butter.

PARSNIPS STEWED.—Put on a piece of pickled pork and boil until it is about half done, or a little more. Then scrape and wash your parsnips, put them on in as little water as will keep them from burning, then add the pork; when the parsnips are soft dish them.

CORN MUFFINS.—One cup of flour, one cup of corn meal, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, water to make a thick batter; mix at night, and when preparing for the oven in the morning, add two tablespoonfuls of melted butter and a little soda. Bake in cake rounds.

RYE BREAKFAST CAKES.—One quart of milk, four eggs, a little salt, and two large tablespoonfuls of rye thickened with flour to a thin batter. Fill the cups half full.

FARM AND GARDEN.

GENEROUS FEEDING IN WINTER.—Many farmers think it does not pay to give roots, grain or meal to store animals. They will argue that so many bushels, worth so and so, were eaten by such a number of cattle, which were not improved enough to make that amount more, and the sheep, too, eat more than they paid for. On this subject there is a great lack of reason, for in any calculation on the profit or loss the quantity of hay or other fodder saved by the feeding of any other kinds of food must be reckoned, and the better quality of manure should be thought of also. On a dairy farm the growth of extra feed will pay to us great or greater degree than on any other for them, for then the cows can be milked later in the season, and likewise come out in Spring in such fine condition from the effects of good feeding, while dry as to make them much more valuable for the ensuing term. Moreover, as every good dairyman will raise his own stock, the liberal man will bring his two-year old heifers out as good as the stony one at three years of age. By the exercise of good judgment in breeding, in conjunction with high feeding, any number of cows may be brought to double their produce of butter and cheese. There are so many milkers required with a large herd, that it is very convenient to grow a deal of forage for Summer use as well as to plant crops for Winter consumption, and rest assured that in carrying out a system of producing a great abundance of nourishing and stimulating food, the profits will increase in exact ratio with the means taken to force milk by natural food. In commerce the safest gains are those from quick returns, and in agriculture the forcing to early maturity of the heifers raised, and the constant continual return from the cows in milk, cause less risk than in conducting most other systems. In sheep husbandry, liberality in feeding tells on the wool the same as in other respects; and if it won't pay to treat the flock well, it will not do at all to neglect or stint it. Think of every flock-master within knowledge and call to mind the dairies which have been most successful, and see if in their cases and in other courses and systems of stock farming the free use of good nutritious food has not invariably led to the most satisfactory results.

KITCHEN-GARDEN WORK TO BE DONE THIS MONTH.—Bean poles should be prepared, labels, rods for tomatoes, for those who use them; the larger market gardeners do not use rods for tomatoes, as the culture is found to be more profitable without them. Prepare manures for new hot-beds, composed of leaves from the woods and horse manure, mixed together, and placed under cover, if not done last month. Make composts previous to commencing Spring plowing and planting, so as to lose no time should the Spring prove early. If the weather be sufficiently mild, make and plant your hot beds in the latter part of the month, being careful not to plant them until the steam is well off, so as to leave your bottom heat not above seventy-two degrees Fahrenheit. If your straw mats were not made last month for covering hot beds, make them now—give air fine days to your autumn plantings in hot-beds. Do not sow new hot-beds in frosty weather, you will gain nothing by over-haste; if the weather permit, you may commence sowing cabbage, egg-plant, lettuce, tomatoes, peppers, etc., but not during strong frost; these will do for your early plantings. Bridgeman recommends forcing asparagus, kidney beans, cucumbers; plant peas, potatoes sow radish seeds in cold beds; wolf-protected; plant broad beans and sow cabbage seed. Give all your hot-beds strict attention; see them well protected at night, and give air as often as practicable in the day time. Should any of your beds prove to be steaming, cover the necessary openings with some loose material, which will admit the escape of steam, without permitting the cold to check the beds or plants too suddenly, or to frost the plants if windy. If you have cauliflowers or brocoli of last year's growth, heeled in for heading, give them full air by uncovering during the day, if not intensely cold, otherwise they will lose color, and show soiled leaves near the stalks. Cabbage stalks, from which the heads have been cut during the Winter, and which were heeled in last Fall should fairly be uncovered for sprouting if you intend to have early cabbage sprouts; gardeners usually uncover a part of their cabbage stalks thus early, as if the sprouts succeed very early, they produce better profit.

CORN GRIDDLE CAKES.—Turn three points of scalding milk to one quart of meal and four tablespoonfuls of rye; when milk warm, add four eggs and a little salt. Bake on a griddle. If too thick, put in another egg and a little milk.

SATURDAY FEBRUARY 23d 1867.

TO ADVERTISEES.

This paper has for many years been well known in this community as the very best advertising medium by which the business men of the city could bring their merchandize, trades, professions, and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood when it is remembered that the four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States in the Rio Grand, East Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all, more or less active agents for the paper; and when it is also remembered that our paper circulates among a large class of people who seldom see any other New Orleans paper.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will, please, whenever practicable, forward money by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order. We have reason to believe that of all the monies forwarded to us by mail but a very small amount has failed to reach us: whenever the letters have been registered.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Rev. J. B. A. Ahrens reports a fine work of grace in the Dryades street German Charge in this city, "Twenty-six souls found the pearl of great price."

By a letter from Ashville, North Carolina, we learn that about the 15th instant a revival of religion of great promise was in progress there, in which forty were converted, and fifty added to the church during one week.

THE DIVINE CALL TO THE MINISTRY.—Is the title of an Essay of 24 pages, by the Rev. Richard Abbe, which we have read with much interest. It contributes a common-sense argument, and statement of this difficult subject, and furnishes some valuable suggestions upon it.

LIKENESS OF REV. W. H. TURNLEY.—Rev. W. D. Stayton has a likeness of the deceased, which will be sent to his relatives, upon application. Write to Linn Grove, La.

REVIVALS.

Methodism has always been characterized by a strong belief in the direct, manifest influence of the Holy Spirit moving, in answer to prayer, upon the people in sudden gusts of awakening and quickening power. For the long space of ten years had Charles Wesley been laboring after holiness without attaining it; and for the longer space of twelve or thirteen had John been engaged in the same pursuit with the same want of success; when escaping from the labyrinth of Mysticism, they emerged into the evangelical method of justification by faith, "the sinners short way to God." It was on a Sunday, the 21st of May, 1738, that John Wesley on leaving one of the churches in London, received "the surprising news that my brother (Charles) had found rest to his soul." "In the evening of the following Wednesday," says John, "I went very unwillingly to a society in Aldergate street, where one was reading Luther's 'Preface to the Epistle to the Romans.' About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for salvation; and an assurance was given me, that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death. I then testified openly to all there, what I now first felt in my heart." "Toward ten," says Charles, "my brother was brought in triumph by a troop of our friends, and declared 'I believe!' we sung the Hymn with great joy, and parted with prayer."

"Where shall my wondering soul begin?
How shall I all to heaven aspire?
A slave redeem'd from death and sin,
A brand pluck'd from eternal fire
How shall I equal triumphs raise,
Orsing my great Deliverer's praise?"

Among those who visited Charles Wesley at this time, was the learned Mr. Ainsworth, author of the Latin Dictionary. "I was much moved at the sight of Mr. Ainsworth, a man of great learning, above seventy, who like Simeon, was waiting to see the Lord's salvation. His tears, and vehemence, and child-like simplicity, showed him upon the entrance of the Kingdom of heaven." During these three memorable days, this venerable man also was converted. On the same day that John "received the atonement," May the 24th, Charles writes, "I was much pleased to-day at the sight of Mr. Ainsworth; a little child full of grief, and fears, and love. At our repeating the line of the Hymn,

"Now descend and shake the earth,"

he fell down as in an agony." This wonderful work, in the comparison with its great results, was, in its beginning, "like to a grain of mustard seed." Count Zinzendorf, from Germany, afterwards Bishop, was greatly instrumental in confirming the faith of the Wesleys. But Peter Bohler, a young man of deep and enlightened piety, a Moravian, who was at this time in England, accompanied Mr. John Wesley, and labored with all fidelity to convince the people that peace of conscience, and holiness of heart, "are only attainable by faith in the sacrificial blood of Christ." Next to the study of the Scriptures, the Wesleys were established in the truth by reading the Homilies of the Church of England. They wondered that they had so long overlooked the meaning of their own formularies. The doctrine of present salvation from the guilt and power of sin, by faith in the Lord Jesus, they there found set forth as the bulwark of the Protestant reformers.

Men who were under sentence of death, for robbery, some for petty theft, composed the first congregation to whom Charles Wesley promised "pardon in the name of Jesus Christ, if they would then, as at the last hour, repent and believe the gospel." "My old prejudices against the possibility of a death-bed repentance still hung upon me, but in the midst of my languid discourse, a sudden spirit of faith came upon me." Several of these convicts experienced, under this preaching, "inexpressible joy and love." Nearly a year afterward, on the 2nd of April, John Wesley met Mr. Whitfield, near Bristol, at one of his immense out-door congregations. "I could scarcely reconcile myself at first to this strange way of preaching in the fields." But on the evening of the next day, he began field-preaching to about three thousand hearers.

From that day to this, Methodism has preached to the people, a present salvation from past sin by faith in the sacrificial blood of Christ. The Spirit of God has weightily endorsed this preaching, in Europe and America. Revivals have been going on hourly, from the time of the Wesleys until now, under this preaching. Make them out what you please, they are worth whatever Wesleyan Methodism is worth. If they be merely the straw-fire of religious enthusiasm, it somehow burns like a planet. The resultant is light, and heat, and blessing, and substantial good, which all other churches are quite ready to share. The multitudes out of Christ are so great, that without some wholesale method of awakening and saving the people, the expectations of the church would be Utopian. A weak faith narrows itself down to the gradual training of long years, under favorable conditions, for the realization of the fullness of the promises, but the history of our church warrants us in expecting and calculating upon those visitations of God's Spirit, which,

"Come as the winds come,
When forests are rended."

"The kingdom of God is not in word, but in power." We believe it. The kingdom of Christ has come in power and in glory. "Thine is the Kingdom, and the power; and the glory." The Spirit of God has come to convict a world. Let Methodism dare to believe in the conversion of the masses of the people.

Our observation is that this power of life waits upon the faith of individuals. A minister full of faith, and the Holy Ghost can accomplish the work of rousing the people, and the church. It is sometimes important to stir the church first, but oftentimes it is only awakened after the work of revival among the people has begun. If a man is called to preach, he has been sent forth by Him who declares "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth;" and there is no limit to the resources of one who consciously goes forth in the Spirit of His master.

The motive power of the Holy Spirit is imparted to the ministry. "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God; who also hath made us able ministers of the New Testament." The prophet sent to Nineveh was prepared by the direct action of God; upon him personally were expended great miraculous forces, that he might be charged with the thunderbolts of his mission. The process was known only to himself; the people to whom he was sent had no knowledge of the causes, nor of that personal experience which gave such a strange power to his preaching. The fire was in his veins, and he was a living sentence from the mouth of God. The strong wind that rent the mountains, and break in pieces the rocks before the Lord, the earthquake, the fire, and the still small voice were addressed to Elijah as he stood, with his head and face in his mantle, at the mouth of the cave of Horeb, far away from human habitation. It was God's sermon to him—God's method of putting the earthquake in the Preacher; that he might,

"The awful charge receive," and respond with new devotion to that call, "what doest thou here Elijah?"

It is amid elements no less wondrous and awful than those which in the wilderness waited upon the rugged Tishbite, that the minister of the New Testament is harnessed for the battle. By faith, he, with Peter, James and John, receives the baptisms of Gethsemane, of Calvary, and of the Holy Mount. The cup of fire, of love, and of power; the Spirit of Christ places by turns to his lips. His heart is filled with "Jesus' mighty love;" his mouth is "touch'd with hallowed fire;" and God to him "The power demonstrative imparts." The atmosphere of the resurrection surrounds him, the anointing of the Holy One is upon him, he opens the doors of the gloomy prison house, and proclaims deliverance to the captives.

PROSPECTUS OF THE CHRISTIAN OBSERVER.—Terms: $2 in Advance.—To be published at Catlettsburg, Boyd County, Kentucky. "In size it will be a fraction less than the Nashville Christian Advocate, but in appearance, and in fact, inferior to none and equal to the best." To be "a strictly Religious News Paper, devoted exclusively to Religion and Morals." "In the interest of the M. E. Church South, it will not be in any offensive sense sectional." The Editorial department will be under the control of Rev. S. Hargiss, aided by a corps of able correspondents. The reading public of Kentucky are well acquainted with the Editor as writer and poet. We hope that the enterprise will meet with a hearty response. Address Z. Meek, Publisher and Manager.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE GLEANER.

DEAR ADVOCATE: That will be an epoch in our church, when each one shall find his appropriate work, when each one shall be made serviceable, and shall find a pleasure in his work.

Evidently in the great work-shop, there is something for each one to do, and if the work could be judiciously apportioned, doubtless it would be done more or less satisfactorily. Find now, if you can, work both practicable and pleasant, for the thousand idle hands, that idly ask work; here they are in the market place, waiting to be employed. And the church needs la-horers. Every talent and degree of skill is needed, and can be profitably employed, under the united effort of the laborers waiting to be engaged; the work can be so conducted and accomplished, that the glory of the latter temple shall exceed the glory of the former. Many obstructions have been removed out of the way. Much indifference has given place to solicitude, and much self-indulgence to selflessness, seeks active employment in the labors of the church.

Rendered timid by the excess of anxiety, we plan only for the employment of the children of the church. The device you have in the form of a little collecting card. A week's experiment with them, has settled unquestionably their merits. We see in them a steady and immense contribution to the success of our Publishing House, a sure guarantee for the permanent support of the Sunday School Visitor, and a vast stream pouring in its steady current into the reservoir of the missionary treasury.

The half dime collection' accumulates in the hands of the least child in a few weeks: the little card has gleaned its five dollars—one hundred thousand of these little gleaners, annually pour their tiny acquisitions into the business and treasury departments of the church, making an annual aggregate sum exceeding the contribution of the most prosperous times. We name the little card the Gleaner, and heartily recommend its use to the preachers, the Sunday school Superintendent, and to the members in general, of our church. Yours Truly,

W. E. M. LINFIELD.

Natchez, Feb. 10th, 1867.

FROM OTHER CHURCHES.

METHODIST-EPISCOPAL CHURCH, NORTH.
NEW CHURCHES IN BALTIMORE.—The fine lot on the corner of Cathedral and Eager streets, has been secured with the design of erecting thereon a large and handsome Methodist church and chapel, to cost $75,000. The lot fronts ninety-five feet on Eager street. The enterprise has been started by the same gentleman who initiated the steps that led to the erection of the independent churches known as Chatsworth and Trinity, which are now found unable to accommodate the increasing congregations. The proposed name of the church is "Madeley," after the church over which the Rev. John Fletcher, the intimate friend and co-laborer of John Wesley, in the early days of Methodism, was the devoted vicar for many years. The style of architecture will be the decorated Gothic, in white marble, like the model Wesleyan Chapel at Portwood, Stockport, England. Two other chapels are also in contemplation to be erected, one in the western section of the city, and the other on the Frederick turnpike road, in Baltimore county, the latter to be called the "Epworth Chapel."—Richmond Christian Advocate.

EPISCOPAL.
THE STORM-CLOUD IMPENDENT.—The Church and State in England are greatly excited at the growth, defiant tone, and audacity of the Ritualists. The Bishop of London has charged on them. The Crown has asked the opinion from nine lawyers on the question of fancy colored vestments, lights on the altar, incense, the mixed chalice, wafer bread, and hymns, at communion. As the question is not to be settled by the Word of God, but by the tradition of the fathers, the whole nine lawyers have decided that vestments were lawful. Six were in favor of lights; all were against incense; five against a mixed chalice; five for wafer bread, and all against hymns at the communion. In the meantime, the Catholics are making much out of this excitement. Religious people who tolerate the mummeries of Ritualism will demand something more.

PRESBYTERIAN.
A union between the Old and New School branches has been consummated in Winchester, Ohio, and a provisional union has been effected in Rockville, Indiana. We notice throughout the country many great revivals among the churches of this family.

BAPTIST.
We call the following from Presbyterian Banner: "At a meeting of the American Missionary Baptist Union, in New York, Dr. Murdock said that Oncken estimates that the Baptist laborers in Germany have preached Christ to one hundred million human beings, and that the number of persons converted through their labors is not less than fifty thousand. He also remarked, that probably a whole number of converts in connection with their missions in Germany, is not far from seventy thousand. This last remark called forth from Dr. J. Newton Brown a reminiscence of forty-seven years ago. He remembered hearing of the conversion of Moung Mau, the first Chinese man converted under the labors of Judson, and it was indeed a wonderful success that he should have lived to hear of seventy thousand having been brought to Christ that country."

UNITARIAN.
The Syracuse Convention affirmed the Lordship of Christ; but this objected to by Dr. Bartol, as opposed to the Spirit's Supremacy. Dr. Frothingham, in refusing to join in forming a local Conference in New York, says: "Our views are sufficiently developed into a system not portable or complete enough to be taken over the country and organized into societies with any prospect of success. Dr. Bellows, however, thinks that 'millions of souls, worn rush from the galling yoke of orthodoxy, if there were only a thoroughly earnest soul in liberal ranks, animated by the business and zeal of the early reformers in the Protestant cause.' It is surprising that the dozen cannot be found; for there is little in the views to make men earnest."

CATHOLIC.
The prompt and righteous action of Congress in refusing to make a customary appropriation for the United States Legation at Rome, account of the Pope's expulsion of Protestant places of worship from that city, has created much excitement among the Roman Catholics. They consider it an indignity to the Roman Church. We would have them remember that the Pope's action is an indignity to the Protestant Church and to the United States Government. Our Government demands the same liberty that it gives to the Roman Church. Unde Sam is not quite ready to acknowledge the Pope as his ruler. It is said that efforts are being made to have the action rescinded, and that congressmen have Roman Catholic constituencies, receiving some very significant threats.

CONGREGATIONAL.
CHURCH ENDOWMENT.—It is that Dr. Cheever's church, in Union Square in this city, is to be reconstructed in its interior arrangements so as to admit of stores on the first and basement floors. The audience room will be above, quite as commodious as at present, finished in the neatest manner possible. The annuity to arise from the rents of the stores is estimated at $27,000 per annum. The arrangement, therefore, is virtually an endowment of the Church.—Y. Exchange.

FOREIGN.
UNPOPULARITY OF THE POPE.—Coldness of the Romans toward Pius IX, in consequence of the monetary crisis, and the Holy Father's refusal of remedial measures, increases every day. Recently he went to Monte Pincio at hour of promenade, when the bus was playing, and a large crowd assembled. He alighted from his carriage, and traversed the garden on foot, surrounded by the police of his household, and escorted the noble guard. But the crowd, place of bending knee and cheer, or following him en masse, used to be done, no sooner caught sight of his holiness than he silently dispersed, leaving the Pope deserted. The Holy Father was wounded to the quick by this sight, and returned immediately to the Vatican, where he sent for Monsignor de Witten, Minister of the Interior, and Monsignor Randi, Director of the Police, and asked them like two colleagues, declaring it was their wretched administration that had deprived him of the affection of his subjects.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Rev. Mr. Spurgeon, of England, has just purchased two and a half acres of land to put up an orphan house. One lady has given £20,000 toward the orphan fund.

LATEST NEWS.

[Special to the N. O. "Crescent."]

The Military Government Bill—A Fall Synopses.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 17.—In the Senate yesterday Sherman's substitute for the military reconstruction bill was adopted by 32 against 3. Buckalew, Davis and Sanbury being the negative. An amendment was adopted that sentence of death under the act should not require the approval of the President. The bill, as amended, passed. The title is amended to read "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States."

The Senate adjourned at 6:30 this morning. The following is a synopsis of Sherman's substitute for Stevens's bill as passed by the Senate. The preamble declares that no legal State government or adequate protection for life or property exists in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Florida, Texas and Arkansas, and that it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced until loyal and Republican State governments can be legally established. The first section divides the States named in five military districts, as in the original bill. Section two makes it the duty of the President to assign the command of each district to an army officer not below the rank of brigadier-general, and to detail a sufficient military force to enforce his authority within the district. Sec. 3 makes it the duty of such officer to protect all persons in their right of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder and violence, and to punish or cause to be punished, all disturbances of the public peace and criminals. He may allow local or civil tribunals to try and punish offenders or the organization of committees on tribunals for that purpose. All interference by State authority is declared null and void. Section four provides that all persons arrested shall be tried without unnecessary delay; no severe or unusual punishment shall be inflicted, and no sentence of life or property shall be executed until approved by the commander of the district. Section five provides that when the people of any one of said States shall have formed a constitution and government in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all respects, framed by a convention of delegates elected by the male citizens of said States, 21 years old and upwards, of whatever race, color or previous condition, who have been residents of said States for one year previous to the day of such election, except such as may be disfranchised for participating in the rebellion, or for felony at common law, and when such constitution shall provide that the elective franchise shall be enjoyed by all such persons as have the qualifications herein stated for electors of delegates, and when such constitution shall be ratified by a majority of persons voting on the question of ratification who are qualified as electors for delegates, and when such Constitution shall have been submitted to Congress for examination and approval, Congress shall have approved the same, and when said State, by a vote of its Legislature, elected under said constitution, shall have adopted the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirtieth Congress and known as article 14, and when said article shall be declared part of the Constitution of the United States, shall be declared entitled to representation in Congress, and its Senators and representatives shall be admitted therefrom, on their taking the oath prescribed by law, then and thereafter the preceding sections of this act shall be inoperative in said State. To this is added an additional section, prepared by Doolittle, already sent in the Senate proceedings.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20.—Much surprise is excited here to-day by the return of Thad. Stevens and his friends to their party on the vote to recede from the resolution to disagree to the Senate's amendment to the reconstruction bill.

Reverdy Johnson voted for the bill to-night, and his conduct is generally commented on; although, remarks in which he has been indulging for some weeks, about the President, have indicated that such was likely to be his course.

A strict party vote of twenty-five to seven carried the bill.

Several of the President's friends say he will not pocket the bill, but will veto it and allow it to pass this session.

Much indignation is expressed among the conservatives at the prospect of such a course.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 17.—Sherman's amendment to Stevens's bill territorializing the Southern States and establishing a military government over them, was agreed to in caucus during the afternoon recess, and passed the Senate by a large majority.

As heretofore indicated by me, General Grant's strenuous opposition to the clause ignoring the President's military jurisdiction and powers, has induced the erasure of that portion of the amendment.

There was much discussion in the lobby to-day with regard to the passage or defeat of the bill, and considerable anxiety was felt as to what course the Democrats would pursue, as it was feared they would filibuster with the more conservative of the radicals, and thereby be strong enough to prevent its passage.

The Louisiana radicals here accept the military government over the South as the best bargain they can get.

Senator Cowan's humorous speech delivered on Saturday evening is highly praised. The galleries were densely crowded at an early hour in the evening, and continued to be occupied by large numbers of ladies and gentlemen during the whole night, many of them remaining in their seats till 5 o'clock on Sunday morning.

[Special to the N. O. Times.] WASHINGTON, Feb. 21.—The Judiciary Committee of the House which is investigating the official acts of President Johnson, examined to-day Secretary Stanton and Rev. Thos. W. Conway on the disposition made of abandoned and confiscated property in Louisiana.

In the Senate a resolution was passed, donating the buildings at Camp Chase, Ohio, for an asylum for disabled soldiers.

A bill passed authorizing a submerged tubular bridge across the Mississippi at St. Louis.

A bill providing for the contraction of the currency and the payment of compound interest notes passed.

During the evening session of the House the Secretary of War was directed to report relative to the property seized by Government agents in Louisiana, what amount restored and by whose orders.

The Senate concurred in the amendments of the House bill declaring over the Mississippi a post road.

The House passed Senate bill to retire one hundred millions of compound interest notes, and to substitute the same amount of legal tenders.

The President will take no advantage of time on the military reconstruction bill, but will veto it in time for Congress to take action before adjourning.

Foreign.

LONDON, Feb. 21.—It is stated that Stephens is not and has not been in Ireland, but report says that he has been recently seen in Paris.

The National troops are posted in Kerry and Cork counties in such numbers as to effectually prevent any further outbreak.

The suspension of the writ of habeas corpus has been proclaimed in Ireland.

The English Government announces that it will treat aliens caught in act of rebellion as pirates.

The Sultan of Turkey has officially informed the leading powers of Europe that he has decided to call together an assembly of the representatives of all the religions creeds in the Empire, for the purpose of adopting measures for the more effectual extension of the provisions of the firman of 1856.

VIENNA, Feb. 21.—The resolution of the Constitution of 1848 to Hungary, has had the effect to remove the troubles heretofore existing. The people are quite and contented.

BERLIN, Feb. 21.—Count Bismarck is again prostrated by sickness, and doubts are entertained of his recovery.

LEGISLATURE OF LOUISIANA.

Governor Wells has vetoed the Bill ordering a vote upon a State Convention for forming a Constitution. He says:

I am justified in believing, from events transpiring in Congress, that a convention of the people as provided for in the bill under consideration would not be permitted or recognized; whether, in view of this almost certain and fixed fact, it is expedient or politic to persist in the enactment of a law that cannot be executed, is a question I leave to the consideration of the Legislature.

Senate.—The act relative to divorces which had been reported on adversely was called up. It provides that five years absence was sufficient cause for divorce a vinculo matrimonii.

Mr. Egan was opposed to a further loosening of the marriage tie. The laws at present sufficiently facilitate the obtaining of divorces. It is not advisable to follow the example of some other States where the obtaining of divorces has become so easy as to have the worst effect on public morals.

A motion was made by Mr. Mohan to lay on the table. Carried.

Mr. Mohan introduced an act relative to places of amusements and business in the city of New Orleans. The bill contemplates the closing of amusements, business and drinking, from twelve midnight on Saturday night until twelve m. on Sunday night. Referred.

House.—The special order of the day, Mr. Thieumann's bill to regulate the public schools in the parish of Orleans was taken up. Mr. Leeds in the chair.

The bill constitutes the city of New Orleans one school district, and enables parents residing in adjacent parishes, paying taxes in the city, to send their children to the public schools in the city limits.

After the presentation of a number of amendments, and much discussion, the bill was, on motion, recommitted to the committee.

CITY NEWS.

THE GRAND BAZAAR—ITS OPENING LAST EVENING—AN UNUSUAL ATTENDANCE.—The long-talked-of event of the fashionable world, the great Bazaar of the Southern Hospital Association, in the preparation for the opening of which no labor, expense, or fatigue, have been spared, and to which this whole community has, as it were, stretched the helping hand of encouragement and assistance, was opened last evening to the public. The exertions made by all the managers and various officers of the association to complete their arrangements so as to allow of the opening of the entertainment at the specified time, were really herculean, and only those who visited the rooms of the Moresque Building yesterday at noon and again during the evening, can appreciate the amount of labor bestowed upon the fitting up of the Bazaar and its interior arrangements. But cease! premier pas qui coute.—This grand undertaking once set in motion, the wheels and machinery in the various departments once started, everything goes on with clock-like regularity, and with a systematic precision, which leaves very little room for outsiders to imagine the obstacles in the way of labor that had to be overcome.—Crescent.

OBITUARIES.

Sister SUSAN P. GUTHRIE, the subject of this notice, was born Sept. 7th, 1840, in the county of Winston, Miss. Graduated at the June term of the Masonic Female Institute, in Homer, 1860. When quite young, joined the Missionary Baptist Church; but after she grew up, became dissatisfied with the church relation, in reference to close communion; and in 1861, severed her connection with that church; and became a member of the M. E. Church, South. She was united to Mr. W. W. Guthrie, of Farmerville, Union parish, La., in holy wedlock, in Nov. 1865, with whom she lived happily one year, and died, her hope entering into that within the veil.

Death dissolves the strongest earthly ties, and leaves friends weeping on the shore, but it opens the way to heaven's door, and ushers the blood-washed triumphant spirit into the glory-land.—Could the prayers and tears of an affectionate daughter, husband, step-mother, sister, and brothers, together with numerous friends, have stayed the hand of death, then Sister Susie had not died. The providences of God are to us wholly inscrutable. It seems to us so strange, that one so well qualified to bless her race, and was wasting the very energies of life for the good of the young who were placed under her charge, should have been called away at so early a period in life. She had an abiding conviction, that she was called to devote her life to the education and training of the young. Consequently, the school-room was her delight. 'Twas there she felt that she was laying up treasure in heaven. Teaching with her was not only a vocation, but a religious duty. No wonder that her success was almost without a parallel. As a wife, she was affectionate and confiding. As a Christian, cheerful, devoted, sacrificing. She blessed the walks of social life, and spread cheerfulness and comfort everywhere she went.

O! how sad the bereavement, especially to a fond and truly devoted husband, who but one short year before, had led her to the marriage altar, so full of promise, so full of hope. But she is gone. When she stood far out on the peninsula of time, looking over the river, in answer to an inquiry by a brother-in-law, she replied, O! how good the Lord is to me. The Lord never will leave or forsake those who trust in Him! Though the proud waves of Jordan, may for a time run high, threatening utter destruction, so soon as the departing pilgrim steps out upon them, the power that once calmed the turbulent waves of Galilee, smooths the stream, and gives the traveler a calm and peaceful passport into the land of promise. O! let me have a peaceful hour on which to die, as the innocent subject of this sketch.

A. D. G. Walnut Hill, Dec. 5th, 1866.

Died, at the residence of her husband, near Entwaw, on the 6th of December, 1866, Mrs. MINERVA E. PATTON, wife of Rev. James M. Patton, in the 33d year of her age.

She was a lovely and most excellent woman. The graces and virtues which most adorn her sex were beautifully blended in her character and conspicuously displayed in her life. Her admirable good sense and high Christian culture made her entirely congenial with the sphere and destiny of woman and to fulfil the duties of the one and meet the requirements of the other, constituted the end and aim of her tranquil and beautiful life. Married, when quite young, to one who fully appreciated the attractive endowments of her mind and heart, she met the responsibilities of woman's holiest mission on earth, with the energy which a true womanly nature inspires, and the success which virtuous effort always commands. A more loving and dutiful wife never gladdened a husband's heart with the dowry of her affection, or brightened his home with the gentle ministrations of conjugal love. Tenderly devoted to her children, she was yet wisely thoughtful of their best interests and sought to raise them up in the fear and admonition of the Lord. Upon her widowed mother, and her brothers and sisters, she lavished the glowing tide of a warm and guileless filial and sisterly affection. She lived without taints and died leaving only pleasant memories and affectionate regrets in the hearts of all who knew her.

Mrs. Patton was a woman of great energy of character, and knew how to help herself. In her domestic affairs every thing was reduced to system. She had a way and a time to do every thing, and it was done in that way and time. Hence, order and quiet ruled in her household. Neatness and order, indeed, were ruling characteristics of her life. Her intercourse and associations with others were marked by candor, amity and that true politeness which springs from the impulses of a pure and benevolent heart.

But the crowning beauty and grace of her character and life was her simple and genuine Christian faith and practice. When quite young she was happily converted to God, and lived and died in the faith of Jesus. Modest and retiring in her disposition, she enjoyed her religion most in the privacy of her closet and the circle of her family. All who witnessed the blameless ordering of her daily life, and observed the beautiful symmetry of her character, knew that she had been with the Master, and that the words of the Lord Jesus had sunk deep into her mind and heart. Though comparatively young in years, she was a ripe Christian, made meet for the Kingdom of Heaven by faith and patience in well doing. And as she had illustrated the purity and beauty of religion in her life, so she enjoyed its divinest consolations in her death. With her, as with all his dying people, the Savior kept the precious promise, that he would come again and receive them unto himself. She entered the dark valley not alone, nor was she afraid, for there walked with her through its shadows one lover, rather than the sons of men and mightier far than the King of Terrors, even the dear Redeemer in whom she had trusted. Such a death is simply immortal life begun, a glorious transfiguration of a creature of clay into an angel of God. Therefore let the riven hearts of the mourning be comforted, for if the earth has for them one charm less, Heaven, at least, has one attraction more.

J. W. T. Entwaw, Jan. 2nd, 1867.

MRS. MARTHA ANN SPENSER, the wife of Dr. George Spenser, and the subject of this notice, was born in Perry county, Ala., Nov. 18th, 1836; she enjoyed the advantage of early religious training. Was brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. And she sought first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness. She publicly made a profession of religion, and anointed with the Church of God in 1856, and from that hour until her death, she never wavered in her Christian character. Her religion was one of principle, and led to the discharge of duty, whether she felt like it or not. And yet it was not without feeling, but oftentimes under a feeling sense of the love of God shed abroad in her heart. She would become happy, and shout aloud the praise of God. For twelve months before her death, she was confined to her room, and most of that time to her bed, during which time she often spoke of Jesus, and of her conscious acceptance of Him. And more than once, while talking of his suffering, she thanked God for the fellowship of his sufferings.

As she approached death, her religious experience became more intense, and her peace became like a river. And many were the lessons of piety which she left with her friends. The last whisper was uttered in Christian confidence, "Heaven. Oh! Heaven." The hope stood still. The eyes closed. The spirit was gone. Thus lived and died sister Spenser.

A. D. G. "She taught us, how to live, but Oh! too high a price, for knowledge taught us how to die." C. C. CALLAWAY.

NEW SOUTHERN MUSIC BOOK.

Just published

TABOR;

Or the Richmond Collection of Sacred Music.

By R. MCINTOSH, of Virginia.

The attention of Chorus and Musical Societies generally is respectfully asked for this new and popular collection of Church Music. Its author for four years an officer in the Confederate Army composed many pieces in moments snatched during his marches and counter-marches. The diligence at the funeral of Gen T. J. Jackson (Stone) May 17, 1863, was from his pen, and is included in this collection.

Says the Richmond Whig: "The writer is well known throughout the South as an author of finished excellence; a musical reputation rarely attained—at the head of Church Music, no one disputing the position with him, and besides, it is ever been one of his aims to compose good old tunes which have come down from our fathers as an invaluable legacy. Also, may be found a number of traditional melodies, which, for half a century or more, have been sung throughout the South and Southwest, and never before in print. We can heartily recommend it to Churches, Chorus, and all lovers of Sacred Music."

It has been largely introduced and highly recommended by many of the Churches in Richmond and Petersburg, where the author is best known. It embraces all the metres in use, in every key and variety of measure, with a full elementary department and fine collection of new anthems, set pieces, and sentences. It contains nearly 300 closely printed pages, neatly and tastefully gotten up, well printed and bound. Price—retail, $1.33; 12 copies for $12.00.

Can be obtained through all booksellers, or will be mailed by the Publishers to any of the United States, post free, on receipt of retail price.

LATEST FASHIONS.
Call for
J. W. BRADLEY'S
DUPLEX ELLIPTICAL
[Or, Double Spring]
SKIRT!

THEY WILL NOT BEND OR BREAK
Like the Single Spring, but will preserve their perfect and graceful shape when three or four ordinary Skirts are thrown aside as useless—hence are the CHEAPEST.

Each Hoop is made by braiding two springs together, edge to edge, forming the STRONGEST, most FLEXIBLE, and still the LIGHTEST Hoop made.

In fact, for promenade, or the house, or the church, the theatre, or for crowded assemblies, railroad cars, carriages, etc., they are superior to all others, affording COMFORT TO THE WEARER, with that ELEGANCE OF SHAPE which wins favor with all, and has made the "DUPLEX ELLIPTIC"

The Standard Skirt of the Fashionable World. For misses and young ladies they are superior to all others.

For Sale Everywhere.
Manufactured exclusively by the owners of the Patent,
WESTS, BRADLEY & CARV,
91 Chambers, 79 and 81 Rodeads, New York.

CAUTION.
The Duplex Skirt will admit a pin being run through the centre of each hoop, thereby proving there are TWO SPRINGS braided together therein, which is the secret of their remarkable STRENGTH and FLEXIBILITY—a combination not possessed by any SINGLE-SPRING Skirt.

The red ink stamp, viz: "J. W. BRADLEY'S Duplex Elliptic Springs" will be found upon the waistband of every Skirt; none other are genuine.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

Since the publication of our last issue the general market has exhibited considerable movement, although few of the leading articles have undergone a quotable alteration. Sugar and Molasses have been in active demand, at higher prices, and Western Produce has evinced more vitality, attended with a firmer feeling in Flour and Corn, and an improvement in Oats; while operations on our leading staple has been to a liberal extent, and notwithstanding adverse advices from New York and Liverpool, the market has continued in a satisfactory position, and closed steady yesterday at our quotations.

COTTON—On Saturday, owing to the limited assortment on sale, as well as the indisposition of holders to yield, the movement continued restricted throughout, and consequently the sales were inconsiderable, comprising barely 3100 bales, at previous prices. On Monday there was a light inquiry at the opening, but later in the day an unusually heavy demand set in, and despite meagre offerings and increased firmness on the part of holders, quite a large business was transacted, the sales at the close footing up 10,000 bales, at firmer prices. Yesterday the market opened with a fair inquiry, and notwithstanding inadequate supplies and additional stiffness on the part of sellers, an average business was done, the sales at the close footing up 5300 bales, at unchanged prices, the market closing steady at our quotations.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 18,400 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 13,534 bales, against 10,402 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 3132 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 581,476 bales, against 479,036 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 60,984 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 80,852 bales to Great Britain, of 20,165 to France, and an increase of 13,229 bales to other foreign ports.

TOBACCO—The stock on sale is reduced to a few hundred hogsheads, and there is little or no room left, therefore, for making selections or filling orders. Only a few small lots of the new crop have so far been received. They were sold at once. The transactions since our last comprise 98 bbls, of which 48 Low Leaf and 40 2 Good Leaf at 10c, 6 Light Leaf at 1 1/2c, 2 New Leaf at 4c, 11 New Leaf and Leaf at 5 1/2c, 25 Light Leaf at 1 1/2c, and 3 New Leaf at 9c per lb. CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE

VOLUME XIII.—NUMBER 7.
WHOLE NUMBER 616.

NEW ORLEANS, SATURDAY, MARCH 2, 1867.

$3.00 A YEAR IN ADVANCE.
OFFICE—112 CAMP STREET.

HOW IT HAPPENED—AND THE CONSEQUENCE.

AN ORIENTAL ALFALGUE.

BY JOHN G. BAKER.

Dame Nature, when her work was done,
And she had rested from creation, Called up her creatures, one by one,
To fix for each his life's duration.

The ass came first, but drooped his ears
On learning that the dame intended
That he should bear for thirty years
His pannels ere his labor ended.

So Nature, like a gentle queen,
(The story goes) at once relented,
And changed the thirty to eighteen,
Wherewith the ass was well contented.

The dog came next, but plainly said
So long a life could be but hateful;
So Nature gave him twelve instead,
Whereat the dog was duly grateful.

Next came the ape; but Nature, when He grumbled, like the dog and donkey,
Instead of thirty gave him ten,
Which quite appeased the angry monkey.

At last came man; how brief appears
The term assigned, for work or pleasure?
"Alas!" he cried, "but thirty years?
O Nature lengthen out the measure!"

"Well then, I give thee eighteen more?"
(The ass's years) art thou contented?"
"Nay," said the beggar, "I implore
A longer term." The dame consented.

"I add the dog's twelve years beside."
"Tis not enough!" "For thy persistence,
I add ten more," the dame replied,
"The period of the ape's existence."

And thus of Man's three-score-and-ten,
The thirty years at the beginning
Are of his right—and only then
He wins what'er is worth the winning.

Then came the ass's eighteen years,
A weary age of toil and trouble,
Beset with crosses, cares and fears,
When joy grew less, and sorrows double.

The dog's twelve years come on, at length,
When Man, the best of every scorer,
Beset of manhood's pride and strength,
Sits growing, toothless, in the corner.

At last, the destined term to fill,
The ape's ten years come lagging after,
And man, a chattering imbecile,
Is but a theme for childish laughter!

SONG.

[From Whitlure's new poem "The Boat on the Beach."
The harp on Nature's advent strung
Has never ceased to play;
The song the stars of morning sung
Has never died away.

And prayer is made, and praise is given,
By all things near and far:
The ocean looketh up to heaven,
And mirrors every star.

Its waves are kneeling on the strand,
As kneels the human knee,
Their white locks bowing to the sand,
The priesthood of the sea!

They pour their glittering treasures forth,
Their gifts of pearl they bring;
And all the listening hills of earth
Take up the song they sing.

The green earth sends her incense up
From many a mountain shrine;
From folded leaf and dewy cup
She pours her sacred wine.

The mist above the morning hills
Rise white as wings of prayer;
The altar curtains of the hills
Are sunset's purple air.

The winds with hymns of praise are loud,
Or low with sobbs of pain,
The thunder-organ of the cloud,
The dropping tears of rain.

With drooping head and branches crossed
The twilight forest grieves,
Or speaks with tongues of Pentecost
From all its sunlit leaves.

The blue sky is the temple's arch,
Its transept earth and air,
The music of its starry march
The chorus of a prayer.

So Nature keeps the reverent frame
With which her years began,
And all her signs and voices shame
The prayerless heart of man.

PROSELYTING.

"Woe unto you Scribes, and Pharisees!
For ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte."

Proselyting as generally understood at this date, in Christendom, means an endeavor to persuade a member of some church communion, to change his church relations, and enter into another communion, in view of some assumed or promised advantage.

From the quotations at the head of this article, it would appear that proselyting is an ancient sin, for a sin it was in the Savior's esteem, for it is among the several obnoxious things, for which the Saviour denounced woes upon the scribes and Pharisees.

The Romanists labor through all instrumentalities, especially their schools, to induce Protestant children, Protestant laity, and Protestant ministers to join their communion. At this I am not surprised, it is entirely consistent with two articles in their creed, to-wit: no faith is to be held with Protestants, no sense of honor or delicacy restrains them from proselyting the children of heretics, or heretics, out of heretic communions, (as they regard Protestants.) Again, they hold that there is no salvation outside the pale of her communion. To suppose then that a Roman Nun, or Priest, will not proselyte every Protestant they can, is to suppose that they will prove recalcitrant to their principles, and be indifferent to the salvation of souls. Certainly, they will proselyte; and that by the most cautious, seductive, and successful means in their power. I must be candid enough to say that if I believed, as they profess they do, I could not do otherwise than proselyte.

The efforts made by Protestants to proselyte each other members, and ministers, is a much less intelligible, and in my apprehension a much less excusable proceeding. If Lutherans, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Baptist and Methodist, would write it down, and come square out with it, as the Romanist have done, that they allow of no difference of opinion, hold no faith with those who entertain other views than theirs, and that none can be saved outside of their folds, we could comprehend proselyting among Protestants as a thing consistent with a purpose to do spiritual good to the souls of those whom they seek to win. So far, however, as I am advised, these Protestant bodies recognize each other as orthodox, holding to the same great fundamentals of Christian doctrine and duty, though differing in polity and forms. I believe they all receive each others members and ministers as believers, not requiring repentance or confession of sin, but merely to adopt each others creeds, polity and forms. I believe all these communions allow to each other real christianity, and a well-founded hope of heaven. If they do not, let them say so. Why then do Protestants proselyte? It does not appear to be to increase the spirituality of the proselyte; nor to increase the certainty of his salvation. What then? some less important, and less worthy ends, that present the whole raiding custom in several most objectionable aspects.

The office and position of the proselyter is immodest, and insulting towards those he assails with his obtrusive importunities. He assumes that he is wiser and better than you; that you need instruction, and that he is able to impart it. He assumes that you occupy your present position through ignorance, or precipitate haste. In short, you have done, what you have done in church matters, without knowing what you were about, and that you need to be set aright by his superior wisdom. Merely to state the inevitable position of a proselyter, is to demonstrate that he is insulting and impertinent.

Proselyting among Protestants, is mean and dishonorable. It is not doing as we would be done by. Just consider the proselyters' despicable methods. In one case he looks about to find soured and disaffected persons, he promotes their dissatisfaction to loosen their church connection, and like another, who occupies a "bad eminence," takes them captive at his will." Or he finds some impressible youth, and seeks by flattering attentions, and professions of great personal regard, to win them; to this, he adds flattery, and says, if they were in his church, they would be more highly appreciated, would have more pleasant associations, and dilates upon ancient claims, solemn forms, extreme respectability, and the like. It is noteworthy, these attempts are generally made upon persons of good social position, who represent money. This renders the whole procedure liable to the suspicion of the most worldly and improper motives. If the objects of the proselyters' zeal were for the most part, the poor and ignorant who need instruction, and help, or the obscure, who need to be brought out of the deep shadow of their position, it might look as though the proselyter intended good, to the objects of his churchly zeal; but such I believe is but seldom or never the case. Another may be seen in seasons of awakening, in somebody elses communion, moving around with a swinish voracity to devour the fruit which the zeal and ability of others (with the blessing of God) may have shaken down.

It is a mean thing to be looking about my neighbors walls to find some shaken or decayed place, and it is a dishonorable thing to pull out these loose but ready heaven stones, and carry them off to build up my walls.

The ministers or layman who take to the vocation of a proselyter, unwittingly perhaps, but not less truly make the humiliating confession, that their church and system of operations are inefficient and unadapted to make successful aggressions upon the impenitent and unbelieving world. Like antiquated and webless spiders, they must take the webs and catchings of others if they would add to their stores, and keep from decay. The fields are white to the harvest, and millions are perishing for lack of knowledge, but they have, (or so seem to confess,) no adaptation for the demands of such a work. They can only manage the wheat, after it has been harvested, and housed in the barn by the toils of others. Tell not these proselyters from other peoples' communions, of quarries of granite, and marble, they only wish the ready heaven and squared stones, that may be found loose enough to be pecked and pulled out of other peoples' walls. Tell them not of gold mines, and the hard and homely toils of the miner, no, these ill-suit their ideas of elegant care, but just show them a bank, or a coffer, out of which it may be possible, without conviction of larceny, to take some ready coined gold, and you put them upon a congenial task, which practice has made easy.

I cannot suppose the proselyter who seeks to decoy an individual for his money, social influence, or to swell the numbers of his own church, from another communion, intends thereby to pay the church from which he takes him, the compliment of being a more efficient church than his own, yet, he most assuredly does so. He says in effect, "Although the world is crowded with sinners, we have no instrumentalities for converting them from the error of their ways, our hope is to take them second hand from you, after you, through the blessing of God, have brought them to the knowledge of the truth, and disciplined them to christian habits." There are many pulpits filled by men proselyted from other denominations. There are few men in our church, of ability, eloquence, and popularity, who have not had proposals, and intimations made to them, to quit the church of their fathers and join some more pretentious establishment. Such a proposition to a man of intelligent mind, and honest convictions, is in the last degree impertinent and insulting, and if the egotistical proselyter were not destitute alike of modesty and manner, the sheerest sense of decency would restrain him.

This whole proselyting is narrow in policy, as it is selfish and unchristian in purpose. In business, it could not make me richer to take my money out of one of my pockets and put it in another. In war, it cannot add to the strength of an army to deplete company M, to increase the numbers of company E. Not a man is added to the battling host. So we take it, such a procedure adds nothing to the strength of the church, as she marches to the spiritual conquest of the world.

There is more spiritual work to be done than all the divisions of Protestantism can do for a long period to come. Let there be no squabbling, and ungenerous attempts to avail ourselves of each others achievements. There are five times as many unconverted people anywhere in Christendom, as all our church edifices could hold. How preposterous the attempt to monopolize God, the Bible, the church, and the world. As well any one nation, attempt to monopolize the sun, the air, the water, and the earth. Let us hold to unity in essentials, the great doctrines of salvation. Liberty in non-essentials of polity and forms, and charity in all. Let all Protestants consecrate their zeal, talents, and wealth, to the evangelization of the world; then, when our glorious mission has been achieved, let us (if then inclined to it) call a convention and settle forms and modes. I insist, we have too much to do, to waste time and energy, in disturbing each others members, and selfishly seeking to swell our numbers, and social importance: while millions alas! are crowding the broad way that leads to death. This has been written for whom it may concern. W.

WE KNOW IN PART.

While the Bible sheds its light upon the past, the present and the future of all time, it also opens a new world of thought in the eternity beyond. It stirs the ocean of mind like an impending cliff falling into a motionless sea; it introduces us within the circle of God's purposes, and puts us within the compass of His plans; it lifts us above the finite into the regions of the infinite—makes us heirs of eternity, instead of time; it dwarfs the mysteries of earth, and brings those of eternity before us in all their magnitude. Like the telescope, it suggests more worlds (or thoughts) than it reveals! As the panorama of revelation passes before us, we gaze in astonishment at these heavenly wonders; we strive to comprehend and understand them; we look at their massive pillars—put our puny arms around them and try to span them, and then look wonderingly up at their everlasting altitudes. We stand up before these mysteries and ask what do they mean, but no answer comes to our troubled minds, the clouds roll up and off, and we shudder as the wheels of His chariot sweep by, because we cannot see the hand that guides them. We are perplexed on every hand—wereason, speculate and philosophise; and then fall back entangled in the meshes of our own philosophy, and "find no end in wandering mazes lost." But it shall not always be thus. At the present we only look through a glass darkly, and we must be content by knowing in part. The reason we think that so little has been revealed, is because there is so much yet to be made known; and the reason why so much looms up in the far-off future which we cannot comprehend, is because there is so much that has been already made comprehensible. Instead of being so much troubled about these mysteries that belong to the future, let us feed on that which is already made plain. We ought not refuse to admire and study the worlds which the telescope brings to view, because it gives us reason to believe that there are other worlds beyond those which it reveals to us. He that improves the present, will be the better prepared to understand the future. The child must not neglect nor throw away his arithmetic, because he cannot demonstrate a problem in Euclid. The desired knowledge is not withheld arbitrarily, but is dispensed according to a wise economy as we are prepared to receive it, and are able to bear it. There were some things in the Divine economy, which angels were not permitted to look into and understand for a while, though they earnestly desired to do so. The gratification of a mere desire to know, might thwart God's designs concerning us, and obstruct the development of our hearts. Our hearts must keep pace with our intellects; our faith with our curiosity, and our practice with our knowledge. There is enough made plain to guide us in the pursuit of more, and progress is the great law here as well as everywhere else. We are traveling on to the Fountain of light, and in that light that makes manifest, all these mysteries will finally be explained. If faithful, we shall stand at last on the mount of vision, and, looking back, all will be luminous, like a thread of silver light running down the mountain side, up which the hand of God has lead us.

J. M. BOLAND.

The Development Theory.

From a Lecture by Agassiz.

The great question is, whether the world grew out of itself, or whether it was the work of an intelligent Creator. The feud between naturalists on this question was as great and as hotly contested as the differences between theologians or politicians. The animals of South America were widely different from those of other parts of the globe. South America was a world in itself now, and had been in the past. He could do little more in the present lecture than compare some of the more prominent types. The animal kingdom was built on four different plans, presenting such fundamental differences that one could be easily recognized and distinguished from the other. These four plans were represented by the radiates, the molluscs, the articulates, and the vertebrates. To the radiates belong the polypus, the starfish, etc.; to the molluscs belong the bivalves, as the oyster and the like; to the articulates belong the worms, crabs, lobsters, etc.; and to the vertebrates belong fishes, reptiles, birds, and mammals, at the head of which is man. These four different types of the animal kingdom, as represented by their distinct plans of structure, have existed in all ages. We find them side by side in the oldest beds of the earth in which animal remains have been discovered. And yet in face of this fact there are theorists who would make us believe that the higher order of animals are of later date. It is a falsification of science. In spite of the obloquy that might be heaped upon him, he did not hesitate to assert that all the animals of the different geological epochs came upon the earth at the same time, and that they could not have descended from each other according to the "development" theory, so plausibly advanced by certain naturalists.

The geological epochs which were at first confined to three, have now, with the progress of science and more accurate information, been extended to sixty or more, and in the first of these epochs are found the representatives of the four types into which the animal kingdom is at present divided. Man did not make his appearance until the present epoch, or, in other words, until the order of things now existing on the earth commenced. Every district of the earth's surface has its peculiar inhabitants, the same as the different parts of the ocean, each have their different kinds of water animals.

With us there is only one kind of humming bird, while South America has more than one hundred different species. If we look at the quadrupeds we find a still greater difference.

The Professor then alluded to the monkeys of South America as compared with those of the Asiatic islands.

The monkey, he said, was the nearest approach to man—near, in fact, as to shock the mind of those who entertain the "development" theory. The monkeys of South America were far inferior to those of the East. Eastern monkeys were found so nearly approaching the human species, that some naturalists had discovered an advantage on the part of the monkey. [Laughter.] In Australia, we find a race of men, but no monkeys of any kind, so that, according to the "development" theory in these countries, the man must have sprung from animals still inferior to the monkey. Another strong argument against the development theory was that nowhere in the different strata of the earth has there ever been found any evidence of the transition of one type of animal to another. The rational mind must, therefore, look to other sources for the origin of different kinds of animals and man. For his part he could not see that this origin could have been other than an intelligent cause; and in view of the intelligence displayed in the whole plan of creation, he could only behold in the animal kingdom the manifestations of a thinking being which had brought all these types into existence.

The Empty Cradle.

There is a whole volume of poetry in the following little sketch, which we find in the last number of Miss Barber's Weekly:

We met John on the stairs. He was carrying an old cradle to be stowed away among what he termed "plunder" in the lumber-room. One rocker was gone, and the wicker-work of the sides broken: it was an old willow affair, but we could not refrain from casting a sad look into its empty depths.

"Gone!" we said dreamily, "all gone!" What golden heads were once pillowed here! heads on which the curls grew moist in slumber, and the cheeks and lips flushed to the hue of rose leaves. When sleep broke, the silken fringed lids opened heavily from the slumberous eyes; smiles flitted like sunbeams over the face; the white fist was thrust into the mouth; and when mamma lifted the muslin and peeped in to see if baby was awake, what cooing and crowing was heard! The little feet began to kick, out of pure delight, and kicked on until both of the tiny red shoes were landed at the foot of the cradle. Where are those heads now? Some that were embrowned by vigorous manhood, are sleeping on battle-fields; some are bleached with time and cares; and the feet have grown sore and weary on the rough paths of life.

Perhaps some little one, once tenderly rocked here, is sleeping in the coffin. Over it grow heart's ease, and the vigorous box, and white candy-tuft, and the sparry jessamine. The blue bird flutters its bright wings through the willow boughs, and the cool summer wind whispers to the green leaves and grass-blades on the grave. What of? perhaps of its immortality. Sleep on, little dreamless one! "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

THE FARMER'S WIFE.—Is there any position a mother can covet for her daughter more glorious than to be the wife of an honest, independent, happy farmer, in a country like this? To be the wife of one who is looked up to by the neighbors as one whose example may be safely followed—one whose farm is noted far and near as a model of neatness and perfection of cultivation? To be mistress of a mansion of her own, that may be the envy of every passer-by, because it is neat and comfortable—a sweet and lovely home? To be the angel that sits through the garden, bidding the flowers bloom, and twining roses and honeysuckles around the room, or sweetening their fragrance with her sweetest smile; or spreading the snowy cloth beneath the old oak at the door to welcome her husband as he returns from his toil; or over-tipping the cradle with her foot as she ples the dasher with her hand, or busily moves the needle, at the same time humming a joyous song of praise that she is the happy and fondly beloved wife of an American farmer—one of the true noblemen of this free country—one that should by right, rank as the pride and glory of America. — Colman's Rural World.

Dr. N. Dyes, chief medical officer at Verdowa, has been experimenting with feeding of pigs on anthracite coal. The animals seemed to thrive so well under the treatment, that he has adopted this as an internal remedy, to be used in all that class of diseases usually treated with coal tar externally.

THE POPE.

There are two themes now which engage every attention, remote in place, but most intimately connected—Rome and Ireland. To avoid any possibility of being mistaken—for I would not be led into any discussion of what influence Romanism exerts on Ireland, or Irish disaffection—I will say the few words I wish to say on each of them separately; and first for his Holiness.

Assuredly, to use the words of the song, "I would not wish to be the Pope." If ever there was a situation of extreme difficulty, if ever there was a crisis that demanded great skill, great temper, great moderation, and great firmness, it is that of Pius IX. at the hour I am writing. Pressed on one side by the extreme Catholic party—those who have long told him that French Protection was a snare, and that of all his enemies in Europe he had none who, either in power or persistence, equalled the French Emperor—urged by these, the Pope is implored to quit Rome and seek an asylum, it matters little where. Their argument—it is not without weight—is, "If you depart, let what will happen, your rights are reserved, and your protest to the Catholic world is on record to show that you have fled before force, and under the menace of such an insult as you could not consent the Church should be exposed to. The heavy trials you will have to go through will be but passing. The present system of Europe cannot last; men will weary and soon sicken of this fever of Liberalism that is now convulsing the world. Signs of a reaction are even already showing themselves, and there will come a wish for that peace the Church alone can give, and that security for which there is no hope out of the fold of the faithful." These advisers press upon him that to remain in Rome and await events, is to surrender not only all dignity and consideration, but to become the actual accomplice of his despoilers; that he will be powerless in their hands, and obliged to submit to any terms it may be their will or their convenience to offer him. They refer to the past, and ask him how much of moderation was shown him in the conquest and annexation of the Legations; but what they chiefly impress upon him is, that constitutional Italy is a farce and a sham; that parliamentary government is a mere mask, to give to the wildest designs of red republicanism the mock appearance of deliberate counsel and policy; and that, though Ricasoli and Yeguzzi figure in the front, the real figures of the drama are Mazzini and Garibaldi.

The Italians—I mean those who adhere to the cause of a united Italy—are strenuous in opposing all these arguments, and are employing every means in their power to prevent the Pope's departure, which certainly could not be other than from one of the greatest complications possible. The main effort of Baron Ricasoli's policy at this moment is, to induce the Pope to treat. Let us only negotiate, says he, and you will see what a fine, generous, and not alone generous but really pious, people you have to deal with. It does not read, I own, very logically, nor does it carry that sort of headlong conviction that can dispense with logic; but Ricasoli's argument comes to this: We are a most devoted people, we Italians; we hunger and thirst to be reconciled with the Church. We feel that, whatever successes have attended us hitherto, their glory is dimmed by the want of that lustre which the favor of the Pope can alone confer; but we also feel that if your Holiness will not consent to resign an earthly kingdom, we must reduce ourselves to the sad alternative of abandoning our hope of a heavenly one; and if you persist in playing king in the Vatican, there is nothing left to us but revolution here, and something worse hereafter.

Victor Emmanuel's Cabinet, in fact, proposes to treat the Pope pretty much as Mr. Bright, a few weeks ago, proposed to treat certain Irish landlords; they will take his property off his hands by Act of Parliament, and see if they cannot administer it more profitably. I do not suppose that the Pope believes, what nearly all Christians know, that his government is one of the very worst that ever existed; that there is not a vice of tyranny, oppression, espionage, and malversation, that has not a place in it; that corruption is the rule of every department; and that there is no effort of ingenuity spared to keep the people under his sway in a condition of hopeless and degrading ignorance. I am sure the Pope knows nothing, or at least very little, of this. Hermetically sealed in a chamber of the Vatican, what can he possibly see of what goes on around him? The very sanctity that surrounds him denies him access to those sources of information which nowadays the highest and greatest draw their inspirations from.

Another of his difficulties is, that over all his policy as a ruler, above all the ordinances of a state government, there rides an unseen power, the conscience of the Churchmen. He is a king, and something more; and it is exactly by this "something more" that he is intractable, "impossible," and unappeasable; so that when you have exhausted all your arguments towards him as a temporal sovereign, he remains passive and untouched in his eternal capacity.

This tone of contempt for the counsels built upon the late changes in the world of Europe pervades all that issues from the Vatican. How much of these things, says they, will survive a dozen years? Is your Emperor of the French eternal, or do you believe that men will consent to live on for ages in that scramble for place, and that conflict of opinion, restless, favored, and dissatisfied, they call Liberalism?

To the Pope's eyes, the events of the last year, great and important as they may seem to us, are no more than the shadowy representations of a magic lantern; nor is it at all unreasonable that they should appear so. The history of the Papacy has not been without its dark days, and yet the Church has shown a vitality that has survived great perils and great reverses.

The Pope regards Victor Emmanuel as a tenant with a short lease, while his own tenure is on lives renewable forever; and from this one point of departure all their different courses are taken.

The last move of the Italian Government has been the circular of Baron Ricasoli to the prefects of the kingdom—a "pronouncement" of the policy to be pursued towards Rome. It sets out by declaring that, through the convention entered into with France by the treaty of September 1864, the Pope's Government has passed into conditions analogous to those of all other sovereignties, and that it must depend upon itself and upon its own resources for the conditions of its permanence; that France and Italy have solemnly contracted neither to prop its weakness nor contribute to its downfall; that inasmuch as such a Government never before existed; nor even now, with the spectacle before our eyes, is at all intelligible or comprehensible how it exists at all, its mode of death must of necessity be as much beyond our power of comprehension as the problem of its vitality. The only thing to do, therefore, is to wait and have patience. That as this union of temporal with spiritual power is one of those things that "no fellow can understand," puzzling the very people who profess it fully as much as the ignorant public who look on, it behooves all who respect the faith of treaties, and who have a due and proper dread of that august ally who dictates them, to wait patiently and quietly on events; to submit with Christian forgiveness to all the severe language of allocations and addresses; and no matter what amount of provocation may be offered, on no account, or under no incentive, to proceed to any overt act in return—never to make reply nor rejoinder; in fact, to leave the Pope entirely in the hands of his own population, and on no account whatever "prejudice the course of events."

A précis of the Baron's circular amounts to this. The popeodism is an anomaly—a direct negation of all the principles of our age. The French Emperor, for certain reasons of his own, has hitherto been disposed to prop and support it; he is now about to withdraw that support, and we Italians are so confident that it is quite unnecessary to hasten what mere time, and certain events already menacing, are sure to accomplish—that we have only to wait patiently, and the game will be all our own.

If there be some sound sense in this, there is some empiricism too. M. Ricasoli says, "Wait and you shall see what you shall see." He neither tells us what that will be, nor how it will be brought about; he never hints at what nature of transaction, what sort of negotiation will be employed; whether it will be the King who will make terms of submission, or his Holiness be obliged to succumb to them. All he declares is, Leave the Pope to the Romans, and he could be in no better hands "for our purposes."

The Pope, on the other hand, does not admit he is so ill as his doctor declares him. He says, in so many words, "If you will leave off prescribing for me, I'll do well enough. It is your drugging and dosing that have upset me. Let me have my own dietary and my own mode of life, and I ask nothing better." Nor, if they be not tampered with, has the Pope the same dread of his subjects that the other Italians are disposed to imagine. It is very hard for the head of a state ever to credit the fact of his own unpopularity. The daily homage of those immediately around his person blinds him, and it is not easy to see through the thick atmosphere of that incense which courtiers are eternally swinging before their sovereign. This difficulty is increased tenfold to a spiritual ruler, who is accustomed to receive a submissive respect that verges on worship, and whose subjects must be wanting in faith before they be wanting in loyalty.

That a portion of the Pope's subjects are not favourable to his rule is true enough; but are these the majority, or do they represent the highest intelligence and the wealth of the nation? This is not so certain; and unquestionably there is a considerable reluctance felt by many of what are called the Liberals to accept union with Italy at the heavy cost of sharing the enormous debt of the nation.

M. Ricasoli, however, has neither doubts nor misgivings. He repeats, here is a system so essentially opposed to all progress and enlightenment, that it must crumble to dust when once the air of liberty reaches it. It is something so repugnant not only to all advancement, but so directly adverse to every principle of common sense, that it need only be left to itself to procure its dissolution. His theory is: it is not necessary to kill the popeodism—it is quite enough to let it die. There is an adage that says, "Threatened men are generally long-lived;" and if the persons whose extinction is here speculated on be only commonly prudent, I see no reason to think they will prove exceptions to the maxim. There is no class of men who can make the do-nothing policy so effective as the priests. The submissiveness that would be cowardly in others to the dignity of a virtue with them; while every attempt to coerce them becomes an act of odious and unpardonable cruelty.

If the Pope and the Cardinals had only to deal with courts and cabinets—if it were to be a matter of discussion and despatch-writing,—a purely intellectual conflict—I know which side I would back; I would not long hesitate to predict to which quarter victory would incline. Not so, however, where the priest has to deal with the passions and impulses of a multitude. Of all men in the world none understand so little the varying moods of the masses in times of political excitement—none are so prone to mistake or so ready to overvalue them. A vulgar prefect of police on such a theme would be worth a college of cardinals; and here is the Pope's great danger.

Priests make the double mistake—"they under-estimate public opinion, they over-estimate mob violence." Now there is not the slightest personal risk in the Pope's remaining in Rome. The Globe or the Guardian office would, I am persuaded, fill a policy on the life of the Holy Father just as freely as if he had taken up his lodgings at Valetta.

I do not think the "Reis" are anxious that this should be believed. They are eager for the Pope's departure, because they are fully persuaded that, Rome once evacuated, the game of their own party will be all the more easily played. They are well pleased to see how far the terror of a personal violence is swaying the counsels of his Holiness. I take it that priests are, generally speaking, more timorous than other men—their very costume must inspire them with fear. It is alike unfit for fight and inconvenient for running away; and when I read the Pope's declaration about going to die in the Catacombs, I felt a profound conviction that he had many years of life before him; but I also knew that he was terribly frightened when he said it.

In these days of telegraph-wires it is nervous work to predict anything. So far from even being able to be a prophet for twenty-four hours, the contradiction may actually forestall the prediction. I am still rash enough to utter a declaration, and it is, that the Pope will remain; and I think he will be wise if he do so. There is a finality about all abdications that is very dangerous policy. The incoming tenant at Rome—and it is not quite certain at this moment who he might be—would probably not make the premises more pleasant to return to; and if it should happen to be Mazzini, he will certainly not pay for "the fixtures." I would, therefore, say to the Pope, Stay where you are, and treat. You will get something, it may not be much, but something you will get if you remain—nothing, absolutely nothing, if you go. Exiles, after all, are only life-annuitants; and it would be a grave question what nation in Europe would burden itself with a separate civil list for a Power that declared itself dethroned and bankrupt when some who professed to be its friends called it as powerful as ever it was, and as rich as it ought to be.

As I correct these pages—written a fortnight ago—for the press, the words of the King of Italy, on opening the Parliament, are before me. He expresses a fervent wish and hope that the Pope may remain at Rome in all independence. It may not be exactly polite to say so, but I am really curious to know whether the King meant what he said, or said what he meant.

If the words simply pointed to the fact of the withdrawal of the French, and that his Holiness no longer depended on the aid or was subject to the dictation of a foreign power, they contained a sincere and a sarcasm on the "angust ally" who affected to be at Rome to insure this same independence. If, however, the speech implied that the independence alluded to was to be confined to questions of faith and the Church, and that no pressure should or could be exercised over the Holy Father in what regarded religion, it was no more than a platitude; and I ask of all,—If the King intended to say that all question of absorbing Rome into the Italian kingdom was to be forever abandoned, and that the integrity of so much as remained to the Pope of his dominions was to be now ratified to him—if, I say, he meant this, he simply rescinded a solemn vote of the Chamber, which once declared Rome to be the capital of Italy, and effaced that decision from the records of Parliament.

One thing, however, is quite certain, the words were heartily cheered by the Chamber, though it is by no means impossible different sections of that assembly took different measure of their meaning; and I have my doubts if Messieurs Morini and Crespi understood them in the same sense as did Baron Ricasoli and Monsieur Minghetti.

That the King had some straightforward meaning of his own, that neither admitted of equivocation nor subtlety, it was only necessary to hear his deep-toned, honest declaration, made in all the soldierlike simplicity that marks all he says or does, and which is still by no means devoid of a certain dignity. The King, besides, is a very pious Catholic, and never had any sympathy with the party who intended, by the confiscation of the property of the Church, to insure its downfall. He would ask nothing better than to accommodate matters with the Pope. He has already conceded much: the bishops are to return to their sees without any pledge of allegiance being exacted from them; a much larger sum than the actual debt of the Legations is to be paid into the Papal treasury by the Italian Government; a spirit of conciliation, pushed almost to humility, marks every step of the negotiations now opening with Rome; so that whatever fate awaits his Holiness, he may feel assured he will be treated with every respect and consideration, and if even amputation shall be at last decided on, the operation will be performed "under chloroform."

NORTHERN WOMEN AND CHILDREN IN AMERICA.

We now come to the last, though not perhaps to the greatest, of the causes that produce the forwardness of women, so much more conspicuous in America than elsewhere. It is loudly proclaimed in the States that all labor is honorable. Such is the theory, to which, however, neither men nor women conform in practice. It is honorable in a man to dig in a garden, to plough a field, to fell timber, or to split rails, to pack pork, to be a tailor, a shoemaker, a mechanic, or handicraftsman of any kind; but it is not thought honorable or consistent with the dignity due to a man who has a vote to be a domestic servant. The women, in the same way, will consent to be factory girls, railway clerks, sempstresses, dressmakers, or drapers' and milliners' assistants; but they will not condescend to become cooks, house-maids, or chambermaids. The very word "servant" is objected to as synonymous with slave, and service becomes "help" in the language of these proud Republicans. The word "master" suffers the same exclusion from the vocabulary, for the same reason; for master savors of slavery. The master of a household in the Northern States is the "boss," by which name the servants or "helps" always speak of him; and the mistress is invariably addressed by her name, and never as "mistress," "missus," or "madam." One servant or "help" never asks another if "missus" rang the bell, but if Mrs. Jones or Mrs. Smith, as the case may be, rang it. When spoken to by the mistress, they do not reply "Yes, ma'am" or "No, ma'am," but "Yes, Mrs. Jones," or "Yes, Mrs. Smith." Even an employer of other than domestic labor is not recognised as a master. There are boss-barbers, boss-builders, boss-carpenters, boss-tailors; but no masters of these or any other crafts. The consequence of this inveterate dislike to domestic service, and to the social inferiority implied in it, is that none but the newly-arrived Irish and the negroes will consent to do the work of the house, the kitchen, or the stable. The negroes do not exist in the North in sufficient numbers to supply the want of "help," and the Irish or so ignorant, so insolent, and so extravagant, as to be the plague of every household which they enter. They take situations as professed cooks, without being able to boil an egg or a potato. They waste thrice as much food as they consume, and their dirtiness and want of order and system natural to them in their original hovels of Connemara or other piggeries in which they may have been born and bred, become most provoking and unnatural in their new sphere of life. In consequence of this sore affliction, housekeeping in the great cities, such as New York, Baltimore, Boston, Cincinnati, Chicago, and others, is so disagreeable to the man who likes a dinner well cooked, even if it should be plain, and so offensive to the woman who desires to have some little enjoyment of her life, that in sheer desperation husbands and wives who ought to be able to keep up an establishment of their own, betake themselves to hotels and boarding-houses, where unhappily they incur worse dangers and suffer greater evils than those from which they have attempted to escape. No man is idle in the United States. Every one has his work to do, and his fortune to push, so that the married woman, living in the hotel or boarding-house, is left to herself at an early hour in the morning, and sees nothing of her husband till he comes home to dinner. This of course happens in England as well as in America to the great majority of people. But in England the married woman can always occupy her time in the management of her household and her children, and can only contrive to find leisure for reading, music, and other amusements, when her domestic duties have been discharged. Not so the American woman living in the hotel or boarding-house. She has no marketing to do, no household expenses to economise, no servants to govern—nothing to occupy her attention but the care of her own person. She dresses several times a day in a new costume for every meal; for as she has to be seen and criticised by her own sex, as well as by the men in whose presence she breakfasts or dines, she has to make as fashionable and gay an appearance over her earliest as over her latest repeat. If the weather be very fine she promenades in the fashionable streets, and goes shopping to the great "dry-goods store" or the jeweller's; or if this be over for the day, or if the weather not to her mind, she resorts to the public room called the parlor, sits in a rocking-chair, one of the greatest social curses of the country, and chats with some other listless idler of her own sex, or still rocking herself, reads the last new novel. The only privacy that a life of this kind allows to the married couple is that of the sleeping chamber. And that women living such a life, always in the glare of publicity, and with nothing to occupy their minds or their time, should remain as timid or modest in their manners as people who live at home, and employ their minds in wholesome pursuits, is scarcely to be expected. The young children who are forced to lead this kind of life are to be as greatly pitied as their mothers. Their only playgrounds are the long corridors or staircases of the hotel, unless the mother take them to the public square or park for an occasional holiday in fine weather. By constant association with their elders they become prematurely knowing, and little ladies of nine or ten give themselves the airs and indulge in the coquetties that at eighteen or twenty might be pleasant enough, but which in such children are painful to witness. The girls are indulged with jewelry when yet infants, and little creatures unable to walk have rings on their fingers and bracelets on their arms. A boy or girl of nine or ten years of age, living with its parents at a hotel, thinks nothing of coming down to the public breakfast-table by itself. It is amusing, though to a certain extent unpleasant, to notice what delight these small creatures give their orders to the waiters, and what copious breakfasts are spread before them. Chop, steak, fish, potatoes, scrambled eggs, ham, sausage, oysters, corn-cake, buckwheat-cake, toast, and rolls,—all these enter into the catalogue of their wants, the corn and buckwheat-cake being usually rendered more agreeable to the youthful palate by large quantities of syrup. To see them eat is, as the Americans say, "a caution."

The American women live too much in doors, and take too little exercise. The summers are too hot to admit of much pedestrianism, and it is only in winter, when the ponds and rivers are frozen over, that the ladies can indulge in the one outdoor amusement of which they are passionately fond—that of skating. Heat, however, is the greatest enemy of their health and beauty, in summer it pours down upon them from the skies, in winter it is generated for them within doors by furnaces burning a dry anthracite coal that parches but all the moisture from the air they breathe, and dries them up to such a degree as to give them the outward appearance of old age before they are much past the prime of life. They begin at a very early age to indulge themselves in sweet-meats—"candies," as they are called—and continue the injurious practice to their maturity and old age, to the detriment not only of their teeth and beauty, but of their health. That something is radically wrong, either in the climate, the mode of life, or the social peculiarities of the women of America, has long been suspected and asserted by philosophers and physicians. "The remark," says Dr. Harvey Lindsey, an American physician practising at Washington, "has often been made by Europeans who have visited this country, and the melancholy truth has been confirmed by Americans who have traveled in Europe, that American women suffer more from ill-health than the women of other countries. My attention has been for some time past particularly directed to this subject, and I am convinced that the remark is undoubtedly true to an alarming extent. Not only is the average health of our countrywomen much less robust than that enjoyed by corresponding classes in Europe, and particularly in Great Britain, but it is much more infirm than that of the other sex in our country. . . . With respect to their inferiority in point of vigor, strength, and robustness to the women of England, I believe there is not one dissenting voice among those who have enjoyed the most ample opportunities for comparison and whose attention has been directed to the subject. The English woman has a much more florid and beautiful complexion, a more vigorous person, and is capable of enduring much more fatigue and exposure. The slender, delicate, and fragile form, the pale, sallow, and waxen complexion, which are so common among us, are much seldomer seen in Europe." The late Mr. George Combe, who quoted this passage in his "Notes on the United States," says that the American ladies ascribe their maladies to the variable nature of the climate; but declares his opinion to be, that their own habits of life contribute much more than the climate to their sufferings; that they do not as a rule walk abroad for the sake either of air or exercise; that they pass their time both by day and night in overheated and unwholesome apartments; and that they eat too much pastry, sweets, and animal food. If American physicians did not proclaim the same facts it would be considered unjust, or at least ungallant, for any English traveler even to allude to a subject so delicate. One great result of this chronic ill-health is that as a rule American mothers do not have large families, and are not nearly so prolific as their European sisters. The registrar of the city of Boston, Massachusetts, in his report for the present year, states "that while the population of Boston has been uniformly increasing for many years, the birth-rate has with equal uniformity been declining, and has fallen from 1 in 26 in 1850 to 1 in 36 in 1865. 'The birth-rate,' he says, 'has been declining throughout the United States for the last 70 years. It appears that only one in four of the children born in Boston in 1865 was the offspring of parents both of whom were natives of the United States. The majority of the children born in Boston in the year were the offspring of parents both foreign-born.' A New York paper, in commenting upon these remarkable and, to Americans, alarming facts, represents that the unwillingness of American women to be the mothers of large families is to be partly attributed to the unhealthiness of American children. But as there are wheels within wheels, and causes within causes, this very unhealthiness may be a result of the mother's weakness of body, which leads her to let her children have their own way out of her sight, and may proceed also from the system of hotel and boarding-house life alluded to. That American women are as naturally fond of children as other people—that their families are not so great as the families of the people in the British Isles—and that barren marriages are but too common,—may be seen at a glance by any one who will take up an American daily newspaper of any city in the Union, and look over the advertising columns. The number of American ladies who wish to adopt children, and make known their wants in this way, is very large; and the number of poor Irish and Germans, who are in the position of the old woman of the nursery tale who lived in the shoe, who are willing to supply the demand for a consideration, is a striking peculiarity of American domestic life. There is one other peculiarity, with which we shall conclude our observations on this subject. The American newspapers announce marriages and deaths, but they never, or very rarely, announce births. If the English matrifamilias should ask why? the only reply to be given is, that for some reason or other it is thought indelicate to proclaim to the world that you have had an addition to your family. But why it should be more indecent to be born than to be married or die, not even an American can tell.

THE CRETAN INSURRECTION.

BY A RESIDENT OF CRETE.

If a speculatively-inclined diplomat, curious to see what political monstrosity could possibly be produced by artificial means, should have taken a people of the highest nervous organization and keenest political activity, full of the instincts of democracy, and with a force of religious sentiment verging on the fanatic; if he should have inserted into the midst of this people a government drawn from another people, or class of a people, in every quality and instinct despotic and arrogant, of organization ponderous and brutal, and in religious temper more fanatical and intolerant than their subjects,—the creeds of the two being at the same time antagonistic; and if then he should have left the ruling element free from all external control, and irresponsible to any sense or law of right and wrong; in such a case the result would have been exactly what the island of Crete, and to a certain extent all Christian Turkey, have shown for the last hundred years, although, from exceptional circumstances, more strikingly in that island, and for the past few years. And yet precisely to such an absurd political fabric did the joint diplomacy of Christendom lend itself in 1830, when, after a breath of freedom won by nine years' incessant fighting against massacre, devastation, slavery, brutalities to Christendom inconceivable, proselytism of the sword and pistol, Crete was redelivered to the Mussulman tyrants whom she had expelled as far as her gates. She was not, indeed, redelivered directly to the power from which she had revolted in 1821, and against which she had carried on the nine years' war,—the power of the Ottoman Porte; but the arrangement was substantially no better which handed her over to Mehemet Ali of Egypt.

The pacification of the island in 1830, under the Egyptian Viceroy, had, indeed, one good effect,—it equalized, to a certain degree, the two religions before the law. But this was nearly all; and Crete, under Mehemet Ali, was mainly in a wretched plight. Take one illustration. On account of certain measures adopted by the Viceroy, which were in violation of the promises made by the Sultan in ceding the island to him, a large number of Cretans, both Christian and Mussulman, assembled at Murnies,—a charmingly situated village at the edge of the great plain of Khania,—to make a protest against the invasion of their privileges. They were unarmed, even with knives; and, while the assembly lasted, the most perfect order was observed, even peity theft from the neighboring vineyards being publicly punished. This assembly sent memorials to the ambassadors of England, France, and Russia, at Constantinople, and the residents of the same powers at Nauplia, and waited to hear the effect of their movement. The then Governor of the island was Mastapha Pasha (at the date of this writing returned, after an interval of thirty years, to his old post), an Albanian, a man of tact and energy, who, through his energetic administration of the affairs of Crete under Egypt, was transferred to the Sultan's service on the restoration of the island to the Sultan in 1840, and gained the surname Kirilly (of Crete). By patience and cunning he succeeded in dispersing all the people without force, until only about a hundred remained. At this juncture, the Viceroy sent to Crete a squadron under the command of Osman Pasha, admiral, with sealed orders to make an example of a certain number of Cretans, among whom were to be a few Mahomedans. What the number of the victims was is uncertain. Pashley says thirty-one; many residents of Khania at the time have assured us that above eighty were so executed, and we have the authority of the representative of one of the principal European powers, resident at Khania during the whole revolution, and still residing there, that the order was to hang five hundred, and that an approximation to that number was actually hung, all the trees around Murnies being loaded with this fruit of Egyptian energy. It is a matter of history how Osman Pasha sent his fleet back to Egypt, himself resigning and going to Mytilene, quitting the service of the Viceroy in disgust.

The troubled life of the Cretan Christians met a change rather than amelioration when, in 1840, the island was restored to the Sultan. An insurrection expressive of their discontent was summarily repressed, and the same result followed all the subsequent movements until that of 1858. As that was the parent of the present insurrection, we propose to describe it more in detail.

The Governor-General of that day, Vely Pasha, son of Mustapha Kirilly, born in Crete, and of a Greek mother, was rather a popular governor with the Cretans. He derived from his father great wealth; he had fine tastes, and a penchant for haz, to which a European education had given a more agreeable direction than is usual with Turkish Pashas; and the early part of his administration seems to have given satisfaction to the Cretans.

But, man of pleasure as he was, the details of business seem to have annoyed him. The Pasha was never to be found when he was wanted, and his subordinates conducted themselves as irresponsible underlings generally do. A general ferment was produced, which only lacked a stimulus to change it into an emeute. This was supplied by a loga-affair. A Cretan Mahomedan woman, one of those nominal Islamites of whom the position makes many, being attached to a Christian man, wished to attire her religion and embrace his, in order to marry him. The Mahomedans violently opposed this, and carried the affair before the Pasha. He gave orders to apply the Turkish version of q-Tabeas Corpus to the girl. Some of the influential Christians, however, gave refuge to the rib of contention, and hid her away, it is said, in the church, and finally got her out of the island in an orange-boat. Vely was in a rage, stormed and fumed more than common, and threatened to hang two of the principal offenders at their own doors. But these two were of the Church committee, and amongst the principal and most influential of the residents, and one a British subject (Ionian), the other Greek and the dragoman of the American consulate. So, as the Pasha dared not act, he threatened all the harder, and, holding the Church responsible, made it the subject of his wrath.

If there is one thing which the Cretans are more obstinate and earnest about than others, it is their Church. The least touch on their sacred objects is more quickly resented than even an invasion of their domestic rights. The population of the whole island took the matter up and held an assembly, to which the deputies came armed. They met near Perivoglia, a village at the edge of the plain of Khania, and so near the mountains that, in case of an armed force coming out, they could make use of their natural fortifications.

Vely, now in dismay, temporized; while the Cretans assembled to the number of 8,000 or 10,000, and in full view of the capital, lit their fires and held their councils. The real causes of the insurrection, as of all others in Crete, were the oppressive taxes and bad administration of justice. The firman by which the island had been transferred to Egypt assured the Cretans that they should only have to pay the tithe and the military tax; but neither by the Egyptian nor the later Turkish regime was this promise in the least regarded. The taxes had grown and were growing, and it had been said that the Government had the intention of imposing new ones on straw, on wine, on salt, and other articles thus far free. Those already paid were onerous, and any increase was unendurable.

When, then, the messengers of the Pasha came out to inquire into the wishes of the assembly, they were told substantially "less taxes and more justice." If they said "another governor," it was not that experience had taught them that there was a chance of a better, but because a change on a hard bed is a relief. Vely was, for the Cretans, one of the best of their governors, but the system of the Turkish administration is always the same. It is the organized and legalized piracy of the Ottoman conquest, scarcely modified by the spirit of the age,—only a little, indeed, by the state of decay into which the empire has fallen. It is to extort from its captives all that is to be extorted, and to give nothing back. It is to make "the infidel" the field from which their harvest is reaped, the mine from which they raise their gold without labor. The Ottoman empire is a huge parasite, sapping the vitality and wealth of the old Greek empire, without returning a reproductive or invigorating element.

Vely temporized, and sent word to Constantinople; Constantinople temporized, and sent troops. The movement, meanwhile, gathered force. When the messengers of the Pasha came, the chiefs, keeping a respectable body with them, sent detachments all along the hills in the neighborhood, so as to give the idea of a much larger force than they really had.

Troubles, too, broke out in Montenegro and Herzegovina, and the troops ordered to Crete were needed in those places. So the Porte sent concessions to Crete. The Cretans were confirmed in their right to keep arms, slight relief was afforded in taxation, and they were assured that the paternal Porte had no intention of increasing the taxes on straw, or putting them on wine, etc. A new governor was sent, and the affair was ended.

Two years later Ismail Pasha was sent as Governor, Sami, the interim governor, being needed elsewhere. His brief administration had been one of the best Crete has ever seen. Ismail was a Chiote Greek, who, becoming a favorite of a Turkish Pasha, had abandoned his religion, and was educated by his master. He was decidedly clever. With the help of his Parisian education he made his way among Turkish officials; and having gained a reputation for energetic dealing with brigands in Anatolia, he was thought to be a fit man to govern Crete.

The nomination might have been a good one if there had been brigandage in Crete; but that particular vice is one absolutely unknown in that island. The vendetta exists, and, when quickened by a little religious animosity, produces consequences with Turkish officials would with difficulty distinguish from brigandage, but in which there is this peculiarity, that its victims are always Turks, and such as have committed some offence against the Christians. The spirit of sturdy independence which gives the Cretans the name of turbulent is something deeper than the highway violence Ismail had known in Anatolia.

This Ismail could not comprehend. The weak point of Cretan character, love of intrigue, he soon found out. It was his maxim that any Greek could be bought, and he rather liked buying and selling. He found means to influence the choice of the captains of villages; and, when any discontent manifested itself, he first tried promises, of which he was never stingy, and, when these failed, he had recourse to his strong arm, bribery.

He caused the captain of the village, or some influential man in it, to use his influence to quiet the affair, or divide the people, so that it might come to nothing. And so he maintained, for several years, peace in the island. He even hired some of the Sphakiot captains to invite a body of Zaptirs into Sphakia, a district which had hitherto maintained a quasi-independence; and, as the force sent was only nominal, and was kept in the most severe discipline, the people, knowing that they could capture them or drive them out when they liked, permitted them to remain. The flaming accounts Ismail forwarded to Constantinople of this important achievement, the subjugation of the bellicose and dreaded mountaineers, established him in the graces of the Sultan, and the Sublime Porte congratulated itself on having found the right man at last to govern Crete.

But the promises came in for redemption. Men who are taxed as the Cretans are must needs think of the taxes, and they began to claim the fulfilment of the concessions made in 1858. In place of lightening them, the Porte thought only how to lay on more. The taxes on wine, straw, etc., were laid on in despite of the proclamation, and the administration of justice grew more and more corrupt, until it was notorious that no Christian could obtain justice except by favoritism or corruption.

The Cretans, after their immemorial habitude, resolved to hold an assembly. The Pasha threatened them with dispersion by force of arms if they met, and employed all his machinery to excite dissensions, and bring to nothing the intended demonstration. The Cretans, in this emergency, unwilling to have recourse to arms, and disconcerted by the defection of several chiefs to the Pasha, drew up a petition to the Sultan praying for relief, committed it to the Governor-General for transmission, and, went home from their martial and local meetings. No sooner were they dispersed than Ismail organized a counter-movement amongst his own adherents, through which he easily obtained a petition in his own favor, denying all that the other averred.

The manoeuvre was an excellent one, and quite worthy of Ismail, who only thought to govern for the day. The season went by, and, as all Cretan movements are made in the spring, the rest of the year passed idly. But the people learned the right lesson. It was 1864. Two bad crops had succeeded each other, and the people were distressed and poor. They winced, and threatened revolution, but there was nothing done. The crop of 1865 was bad also, and the people were in still deeper distress; but the Government must have its revenues. That bottomless pit into which are now poured, and have been poured for so many years, all the wealth of the loveliest part of the old world,—the Turkish treasury,—knows no echo of a people's woes. Grasp, grasp, wring, and bleed; money is wanted. Another turn of the wheel, faithful Ismail! And so in 1866 Crete burst out,—not into armed insurrection, but into an assembly, and this time with such unanimity that Ismail dared not resist. It was convoked at Boutzounaria, a village of the Khania plain, at the foot of the mountains, and not far from Murnies, where the famous assembly had been held in the time of Mehemet Ali's rule over Crete.

Thence the aqueduct which brings the water to Khania has its supply from a spring bursting out of the living rock. The country round is one expanse of orange-groves and gardens; east, north, and west, and even as far south as the rocks permit, are magnificent olive-orchards. From the head of the aqueduct one sees the whole plain of Khania; and here, on a little table-land, the Assembly which will be famous among its fellows met at the end of April, unarmed.

A lady, the wife of one of the consuls resident at Khania, who visited the Assembly at that time, writes, "It was a strange sight, and exceedingly picturesque as well as impressive,—so many rough and strong-looking men gathered together in such good order. A few came to us, and invited us to alight, offering us such refreshment as they could give."

A little while before we arrived, a messenger from the Pasha—a Cretan in his interest, sent to urge the Assembly to disperse—had been insulted by one of the people as a renegade and traitor. The mountaineer then spit in the face of the emissary, and was immediately put in prison by the chiefs as a punishment. A number of the people were discussing this affair with much warmth as we rode up, and one of their number explained to us the cause of the discussion, apologizing for the warmth they showed, but all were in good temper, so far as I could see. They afterwards sent a formal apology to me at Khania, for having allowed themselves to show any excitement at the moment when we came to honor them with a visit."

The Assembly forbade the selling of wine in their vicinity; and, when a Cretan Turk, who came with a barrel of wine of his native land, complained of being ordered off by the Assembly, they told him that he might sell if he would give a written guarantee to be responsible for all the damage caused by his commerce. He declined the offer, and carried his wine back to Khania. (TO BE CONTINUED.)

"OZONE."

If any one of our readers should ever stand in need for after-dinner conversation, of a subject of mysterious character and imposing name, we can conscientiously recommend to his attention the substance whose sonorous name of two syllables stands at the head of this brief article. We can safely presume that it will possess for him the charm of novelty, inasmuch as probably not more than one out of ten of our readers, otherwise so well informed, has ever heard, and perhaps hardly one out of a hundred has the least idea of the meaning of the word. And yet, after all, the subject is not a new one; the thing is as old as the air we breathe, although its existence was discovered only about twenty-five years since. In order, however, that we may not be taken to task for recommending a topic of conversation without affording the means of making it available, we propose to set forth a few facts and experiments, which we trust will not prove so obscure and incomprehensible as our pretensions title might lead to suppose.

Whoever has happened during a thunder-storm to be in the proximity of an object which has been struck by lightning, or who has been present at any electrical experiments on a large scale, may have perceived in the air a certain peculiar pungent odor, which to ordinary nasal organs has something of a sulphurous or phosphoric character. This smell was for the first time in 1840 subjected to an experimental examination by the chemist Schonbein. He looked for the cause of the odor, and discovered that it proceeded from a gaseous elementary substance to be found in the atmosphere, and which was set at liberty by the action of the electricity. On account of its peculiar smell, he called this "Ozone" from the Greek word ozein, which means "to smell." Since this discovery ozone has been subjected to repeated experiments and analyses, and its nature and composition have been explained by various theories. Some savants maintain that it is not an elementary substance, but only electrified oxygen, the formation of which they explain by the hypothesis, that in ordinary oxygen the atoms are united in groups which, by electricity or the action of certain other substances, are separated into isolated atoms, whereby the chemical activity of the oxygen is increased. The solutions of these questions we may leave to natural philosophers and chemists, and content ourselves with the fact that, whether it be a proper elementary substance, or only a modified condition of a long known constituent part of our atmosphere, ozone plays a very important part in the economy of nature. It possesses, namely, the power of oxidizing bodies, upon which ordinary oxygen has no effect, and in this power lies the secret of the beneficial influence which its presence has upon the atmosphere. In certain localities, especially in thickly populated districts, crowded cities, or low-lands, one sometimes perceives in the air the evolution of noxious vapors, arising from organic matter in an advanced stage of decomposition or decay. If such an atmosphere as this be condensed, there separates from it a corrupt animal or vegetable material of so poisonous a nature, that even a very minute quantity administered to a healthy, vigorous animal, will cause death, attended with all the symptoms of a virulent fever. This poisonous substance, composed in part of the secretions of the lungs and skin, owes its deadly effects to a union of oxygen and carbon in a condition of imperfect oxidation, in order to render which innocuous an agent is needed, which is a more powerful oxidizer than simple oxygen. This part is played by ozone, and through the presence or absence of this agent in the atmosphere the healthy or insalubrious condition of the air is determined.

The power of oxidation possessed by ozone affords a valuable means by which the amount of this substance present in the atmosphere may be ascertained and measured. For this purpose it is only necessary to expose to its influence a substance, the oxidation of which by means of ozone is perceptible to the eye. Meteorologists, for this end, make use of a piece of paper or cotton-wool which has been soaked in a solution of iodide of potassium mixed with starch. If a strip of the paper so treated be exposed to the influence of ozone, the mixture with which it is saturated undergoes decomposition, and the iodine separating itself from the potassium affects the starch, whereby a brown or purple color is imparted to the paper. If there be no ozone present in the atmosphere, no change takes place, but the paper remains white, as before. Meteorologists have devised a scale of colors, which shows the gradual transitions from white, the symbol of an entire absence of ozone, to deep brown, which denotes an air strongly impregnated with ozone. The gradations lying between these two extremes are usually divided into eight shades of gradually deepening color, which are designated by the corresponding numbers. If then a strip of this paper above described be hung for a certain length of time in a free stream of air, and the shade of color obtained in this way be compared with the scale, the quantity of ozone which was present in the air, during the time that the paper was subjected to its influence, can be expressed by a corresponding number. The quantity of ozone which can be measured in this way is not constantly the same, but is found to vary from day to day and from month to month, a proof that its presence, at certain times or in certain places, is dependent upon universal laws. The maximum is found in May, the minimum in November; during the night-time it is present in greater quantity than during the day. One finds it in larger proportion in the upper strata of the atmosphere, on mountains for instance, than in valleys, and lowlands, while in the open country is found three times the quantity of ozone which exists in cities and thickly populated districts. Southerly winds bring it in greater amounts than do those from the north, while in calms hardly a trace of it is to be discovered. The most important circumstance, however, which is connected with Ozone, is the relation that it bears to epidemic diseases.

Wherever observations of the presence of ozone have been instituted, it has been demonstrated that where there is a predominance of this principle no cholera or intermittent fevers exist, but that these diseases increase and spread in proportion to its disappearance from the atmosphere. Doctor Moffat, a distinguished physician and meteorologist, who has compressed within the limits of a concise treatise the results of observations continued during six years, tells us that the poisonous vapors of which we have spoken,—in other words, miasmas,—arise in the lower strata of the atmosphere, and exert their noxious influence upon the human system, until they are dissipated by ozone. He shows further that, in the absence of ozone, which counteracts animal and vegetable decay, fevers and cholera are developed. In stagnant damp air, in which objects feel clammy and sticky to the touch, where the physical powers are torpid and feeble, the spirits depressed and languid, and, in fine, all nature has an appearance of relaxation, no ozone at all is present. If this condition continue for any length of time, fevers spring up, and increase in virulence, and finally pass into cholera, which spreads far and wide its fatal effects until it is checked by changes in the atmosphere, brought about by the advent of a wind surcharged with ozone. The column of quicksilver in the barometer, which has all along stood at its very highest point, begins to fall rapidly, a storm takes place, and "clears the air," as is commonly and most correctly said, the storm being attended by a southerly, or ozone-charged wind; torrents of rain fall, the ozone makes itself manifest, and from the time that the strips of (chemically-prepared) paper begin to show color, one can rely upon the abatement of the cholera!

The correctness of these conclusions Moffat substantiated by the fact, that when, in September, 1853, the cholera became epidemic in Newcastle, a stagnant condition of the atmosphere was prevailing, during which the quantity of ozone present had sunk to the minimum degree. The first case of cholera was reported on the 31st of August, and in twenty days the epidemic had attained its highest degree of virulence. Now, however, on the 19th of September, Moffat noticed that the calm was upon the point of giving way to a southerly wind, and communicated by letter this circumstance to a colleague, who was making similar observations at another and distant point. Up to the 20th of September there had been one hundred and eight fatal cases of cholera, ten of diarrhoea. The succession of winds laden with ozone then set in, as above stated, and in the following eight days only twenty deaths were reported, eighteen from cholera and two from diarrhoea. In September, 1854, the cholera was raging in London with a daily increasing mortality, until it reached its maximum on the 10th of that month. On that day Doctor Moffat again noticed the commencement of an "ozone-wind," and on the 12th the action of the ozone on the iodine-paper showed itself with an intensity which was expressed by the fourth degree on the scale of colors which we have described. From this day the sanitary statistics evidenced an abatement of the epidemic.

If the cause of the cholera epidemic becomes now to a certain extent clear to us, so must we also comprehend how important it is to free the districts in which these maladies arise as far as possible from the causes which induce disease. This can be done, and without doubt is done in the most practical manner by mechanical means, and measures of sanitary precaution; but in order to purify the vitiated air from its noxious ingredients is needed the means of purification which nature affords,—viz. ozone. Nature, indeed, we cannot command. The wind which brings ozone, is not at our beck and call,—and we have not the power to send at will salubrious southerly breezes to the plague-stricken city; but savants tell us, that we may hope to accomplish the same effects by artificial production of this purifying agent. We overcome cold by artificial heats, darkness by artificial light; shall it not also be possible to introduce into a pestilential atmosphere, a sufficient quantity of the disinfecting medium, to counteract the poisonous elements at work, and, as far as regards their fatal effects, to destroy them? Great quantities are not needed to gain this end, for ozone is in itself a very powerful agent. An atmosphere which contains one five-thousandth part of its volume of this substance, is quickly fatal to small animals, or birds, who breathe in it. If the human lungs inspire an air which is only some few degrees over-saturated with ozone, in consequence of the irritation caused by it, catarrhs of the respiratory organs ensue, and if only one fifty-thousandth part is mixed with the air, it becomes perceptible by its peculiar smell. From these facts can be conjectured what an infinitesimally small quantity is needed, in order to insure the purification of an infected district. In the laboratory, so-called "ozone-generator" is used, consisting of a modified form of the well-known electrical apparatus, the "Leyden Jar," through which atmospheric air is conducted in order to "ozoneize" it by means of electricity. This apparatus serves only for philosophical experiment; but it suggests the idea, that a similar mechanism might be made serviceable for sanitary purposes.

It sounds almost like a jest, when one speaks of a change of air, without at the same time a change of place; and yet there is nothing absurd or impossible in the idea. Eighty years ago who would have believed that one day coal would be distilled in an iron retort, and the gas in this manner obtained conducted for leagues under ground, in order to light our streets and houses? And who will venture to say, that we shall not be able to compel ozone to render mankind a most important service, and at some not far distant day make use of it to purify the fever-polluted air of the sick-room from its poisonous vapors, or to stand as sentinels at the gates of the cities, to ward off one, at least, of the grim messengers of the King of Terrors?

TO ADVERTISERS.

This paper has for many years been well known in this community as the very best advertising medium by which the business men of the city could bring their merchandise, trades, professions, and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood when it is remembered that the four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States in the Rio Grand, East Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all more or less active agents for the paper; and when it is also remembered that our paper circulates among a large class of people who seldom see any other New Orleans paper.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order. We have reason to believe that of all the monies forwarded to us by mail but a very small amount has failed to reach us: whenever the letters have been registered.

Death of Rev. Wm. H. Starr

It becomes our painful duty to announce the death of our venerated and much loved brother, Rev. Wm. H. Starr, which occurred on the 14th inst., in the vicinity of Murfreesboro', N. O. This venerable servant of God had been a member of the Virginia Annual Conference 31 years, and was esteemed and loved by all his brethren as a man of deep piety, and excellent abilities as a minister of the gospel. His last moments were an appropriate close to a life of uniform piety and great usefulness. With the shout of victory on his lips he passed sweetly and triumphantly to the bosom of his God. His remains were brought to this city and entered in the Hollywood Cemetery. An appropriate and impressive discourse was delivered by Bishop Doggett, on Sunday afternoon at Centenary Church, to a large and deeply affected congregation.

In due time a suitable memoir commemorative of the virtues of our venerable brother will appear in this paper.—Richmond Christian Advocate.

MEANS AND ENDS.

Are Christians to accept the prevailing casuistry, that the end sanctifies the means? As an imputation against himself and the early Christians, Paul declares, "we be slanderously reported." The disciples of Loyola avow this principle, and their history attests but too well, that, with them, it is no abstraction. The end overshadows all, and any means to secure it is justifiable. The Pharisees, of Christ's day, "compassed sea and land" to make a proselyte. They were not careful about the means, but pressed all expedients into service whether good or bad.

Is "the Lot" a justifiable resort in our amusements, our business, or in our religious and benevolent enterprises? Watson in speaking of the Lot says, "It unquestionably implies a solemn appeal to the Most High to interpose by his decision; and so every thinking man will be very careful that he has a true and religious ground for so serious a proceeding; and few if any cases can now occur in which it can have any justification." All resorts to what is called chance, are in effect the use of the lot, and ordinarily verge closely upon profanity. It is doubtful whether we have a right to divert, what was originally a sacred appeal to God, to the common and lower uses of life, nor is it certain that we can clear such uses from the charge of irreverence and sacrilege.

If it be said that cards and dice, and wheels, are means of referring, the decision of interests involved, to chance; this chance is to the Christian, but another name for the divine providence. If it be said, that the decision is in accordance with physical laws and mechanical forces where no divine interposition is either sought or admitted, the perversion and profanation, of what is holy and sacred, remains. This we believe to be a good argument against all games of chance. The more trivial the occasion, the greater the sin, whether it be drawing straws, tossing a penny, or throwing cards for mere pastime.

But apart from the profanity of any than the most sacred uses of the lot, it is open to other objections. It leads from games of amusement to the passion and vice of gambling. It becomes at length a business and a mania: attended with dissipation and the loss of integrity and self-respect. It is destructive to sober industry, and the legitimate pursuits of business. Public lotteries when allowed, are placed under stringent regulations; and are generally prohibited. The testimony of legislation is generally against them, and, says Webster, "almost all men concur in the opinion that their effects are pernicious." The suppression of open and public gaming institutions, enters into the police regulations of nearly every civilized community. Almost by common consent of the world, the evil tendencies of games of chance, especially for gain, are admitted. The Christian world certainly does not advocate gambling in any of its forms. The churches through their pulpits, and authorized exponents, have usually protested against it.

It is not our purpose, particularly to demonstrate the wrong and evils of lotteries, but rather, upon the verdict which is universally conceded, to press the question, whether we are to do evil, that good may come? Does the end secure absolution from the obliquity of the means, or are the means transmuted, and made holy by the benevolence and sanctity of the end? The propensity for gaming is strong at this time. We have gift enterprises of every kind, gift book stores, where the customer, besides his legitimate purchase, draws a prize; places of amusement, where, the ticket-holder, besides the enjoyment of the entertainment, carries away with him a gift of some sort. Things are raffled, from an Opera house, down to a horse. In every direction we meet with this mania for gambling. A deep and widespread demoralization pervades society, on this subject.

The worst aspect of the matter is that the lot has been introduced into religious and benevolent enterprises. We regret to know that in fairs, for the purposes of liquidating Church debts, and the furtherance of religious objects, the raffle and the lottery are not always excluded. What is more calculated to nourish and spread the evil, than this application of the gambling principles, where it receives the endorsement of beauty, respectability, and even of religion? Could St. Paul have countenanced this, and at the same time, declare it a "slandorous" imputation that he did evil, that good might come?

Nor is the evil less apparent, where the enterprise is less religious than merely benevolent in its objects. The more universally these objects appeal for support, upon grounds of charity or patriotism, or both combined, the more pernicious will be the result. However splendid the financial success, it is hardly an open question, whether the injury to public morals and industry, does not more than counterbalance the good. The essence of gambling is in the lottery, and its use under any circumstances, countenances the principle, and inspires the passion. If we may gamble for benevolence, why not also to swell the revenue of a State, or to secure private fortune? If men will give only by this mode of addressing their selfishness and sordidness, their money is not worth what it costs: Society has to pay for this endorsement of a wrong principle, in the multiplied evils which grow out of it. Between the prize ticket of a Bazaar, of the Havana lottery, or a chance at the roulette table, we can see but little difference, unless we adopt in all truth and sincerity, the sentiments which the great Apostle disclaims, as being, slandorously reported of himself.

That the fanaticism of the Jesuit, and the bigotry of the Pharisee, should pitch upon some casuistical solution of the difficulty is not very remarkable; nor is it to be wondered at, that the irreligious world, should be satisfied with an arrangement which takes off the edge of giving, and invests the act with sordid and selfish attributes. But how is it with the conscience of Christians? Must we pat the world on the back, and countenance its worst vices, in order that we may get its money for good and holy purposes? We have hardly so had an opinion of the world, but if we had, we should take a more hopeful view of the Christian conscience.

The Christian churches ought to be a unit upon this subject, and should have no fellowship with the works of darkness. How far religious principle is compromised by countenancing and patronizing enterprises which have the lottery for their subordinate or leading feature, we need not determine. The Son of Man was betrayed by a kiss; and Christian men may be led into evil, by the real benevolence in which vice is often disguised. It is time that Protestant Christians should stamp, this practice with their uniform condemnation. There is a call for our common protest against gambling in every form, whether in the social circle for amusement, in the halls of dissipation, as creations of the State, or as the adjuncts to noble enterprises of religion and benevolence.

THE ADVOCATE FOR THE WIDOW.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.

We acknowledge the receipt of a letter from our esteemed friend and brother, Moses U. Payne, dated San Francisco, Cal., enclosing a check for fifty dollars. After deducting $6. for other subscriptions, the balance is to send the Advocate to widows of our Church, who may not be able to take it. This generous act is in Bro. Payne's line, one of many good things he has done—and we thank him for it in the name of those who shall be blessed and comforted by it.

There have been some instances of generosity and charity of this sort, but we are surprised, that many do not resort to this means of doing good. We put the paper down to the lowest price, by which it can live, that the more may be able to have it. But there are many worthy and pious people in our Church, who are not able to spare even THREE DOLLARS from their scanty resources for a religious paper. Next to the Bible and Hymn Book would the Advocate be prized by many who never see it. The poor of our congregations ought to be supplied. Would it be impracticable for our pastors, in many places, to raise enough money to supply the destitution within their bounds? Bro. Payne's example we hope will not be lost upon many others who have the means and the disposition to enter this open door of benevolence.

LETTER FROM BISHOP ANDREW.

Our Northern friends have been for some time past making a great ado about evangelizing the negro. Missionaries are being sent out ostensibly for the purpose of preaching the gospel to the untaught negro, and building up churches. Now, judging from the teachings of these men, we are authorized to call in question both their honesty and piety in the gospel which they teach. To those of us who have grown up with the negro, played with him in boyhood, and mingled with him in the services of God's house, who have marked the efforts made by the various Christian denominations in the South, and how little aid we received in prosecuting this glorious work from Northern Christians, we can but wonder at the sudden zeal which has so violently taken possession of these Northern Christians, and urges them on to convert the negro, or rather to gather our large negro churches into the fold of the M. E. Church.

For years we had been spending thousands of money, and employing the attention and labor of hundreds of faithful and laborious preachers, who, with untiring diligence and zeal, went from cabin to cabin on the rice fields and the cotton plantations, preaching Jesus and the resurrection to those benighted sons of Ham. Nor did they preach in vain: thousands of negroes heard and believed, and walked in the light of God's countenance, and brought forth such fruits of Scriptural piety as commanded them to the confidence of all who knew them. These we had gathered into churches upon the old Christian Methodist platform. The pastor loved his flock, and the flock reciprocated his thrice affectionate attention to them. Many of the owners, too, had, through this missionary influence, been led to know and love the Saviour. A great and glorious change was thus being wrought in numerous large plantations, which must eventually have achieved a glorious victory for Jesus and his salvation: but these fair prospects have all been blasted.

Now let us ask why slumbered this great zeal for so many years? Why did they so long manifest no concern for the salvation of the beings who are now so intelligent and beautiful in their eyes? Instead of helping us they did all they could to hinder us. We intreated them to cease their abolition harangues, and permit us to go on with our work in such wise as we knew would be best. They not only gave us no aid, but did their best to hinder us. I remember very well when some of our Yankee brethren came and remained South on account of health, and I do not remember that any one of them ever offered to labor for the sake of the poor negro, but I do distinctly remember that some of them considered that it was a slight intended to be cast on them, when their names were announced in connection with a negro work. But no sooner than war has ceased, and there is but little danger of persecution, and there is a favorable opening to gain the control of our negro chapels, and swell their numbers by alienating these thousands of the blacks whom the Lord hath given us as the seals of our apostleship, than they become instantly greatly interested in the negro, and forthwith they send their agents to seize our churches wherever they can, and by various ungodly artifices, draw off our people to unite with them. They tell them that they have never heard the pure gospel, although many of them have been pious for half a century. They tell them, "We are rich, we have plenty of money; come join us and we'll build your churches, and school houses, and pay your preachers and teachers. The church South is poor, they can do nothing for you, nor can the African Methodists do any better for you, for they also are poor." They tell them, moreover, "The Southern church will soon die out, but ours is the only real Southern church." And with such sort of speech, they prevail on many to follow them.

Nor is this all. They have sought diligently to prejudice the negro against the white people; thus alienating them from the best friends they will ever have, encouraging them to such a course of conduct as may induce in the mind of the white man a state of feeling which must be eventually prejudicial to the negro race. Every Elder ordained in the M. E. Church has solemnly vowed at his ordination to promote peace and good will among all Christians people, and their Bishops have made a similar vow; and yet these very men go abroad throughout the bounds of the Southern Conferences, for the avowed purpose of breaking up our institutions, which they seek to accomplish by any means, honest or dishonest. Is this the way to promote good will and peace among Christian people? It is certainly a very new gospel, not found in the writings of Christ or his apostles. They boast of their great riches. Yes, they have plenty of money. Their people have been quite liberal of their money, and with these fruits of their peoples' mistaken liberality, they are doing all they can to corrupt and bribe our people to leave us and join them. And no doubt they will succeed with many, for in all communions there are always men who are to be bought, and doubtless there are in our own communion many such. Hence it is not strange that some preachers and people have gone over to them. Perhaps after awhile both parties will find that they have been mistaken. The Church South is no doubt environed with difficulties, but if she is true to her glorious apostolic mission, she will at last come out like gold purified in the fire. Let us, preachers and people, rally to the church in all her efforts to protect the right, support her institutions, and that with vigor. They reproach us with our poverty. True, we are poor, but God can sustain us, and give us a triumphant escape from all our threatened evils, only let us be true to God and ourselves.

JAMES O. ANDREW,
Summerfield, Ala.,
Feb. 15, 1867.

A GOOD ENTERPRISE.

WASHINGTON, LA., Feb. 22, 1867.
REV. J. C. KEENER, D. D.—
Dear Brother: There are within the limits of my charge, many poor children whose parents have not the means to give them a common education, and whose inability is the result of the late war; if the parents are political sinners, and merit the pains and penalties of vindictive power, (?) the children are innocent sufferers, and are worthy subjects of even radical sympathy, much more do they claim the generous sympathy of those who are identified with them in nativity and nature—not in misfortune. If I were able to educate these children free of cost, I would do so, but I am not. I therefore propose the following plan, and if you think it is practicable, endorse it, and put it in the hand of one of your wealthy friends whose liberality and means are equal, and who may accept, modify or reject as his (or her) judgement may dictate.

I propose to take all the children of the above named class within the limits of my pastorate, and put them to school under my immediate supervision, at the lowest tuition rates, and at the close of each term (five months) write a report signed by two competent witnesses, and send it to the patron who will promise to pay the tuition bill. This act of generosity toward our poor, published in our papers, would pay some of your wealthy merchants well in the way of patronage, and the higher rewards of beneficence will be clear gain.

Yours with fraternal regard.

J. D. ADAMS.

We publish the above communication from brother Adams, hoping that it will meet the eye, and reach the heart, of some generous soul. We can endorse brother Adams as worthy of all confidence. Any trust committed to him will be wisely and faithfully administered. We know that he is capable of doing anything that he undertakes, and that he is moved by the most self-sacrificing and disinterested motives. Shall there not be a prompt response to his proposition? We hope so.

Ed.

DEATH OF REV. E. R. VEITCH.—The many friends of this reverend gentleman will learn with regret of his death, which occurred at Newtown, Virginia, on Sunday night last. Mr. Veitch entered the Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in 1831, and had been engaged in the regular work of the ministry ever since—a period of thirty-six years. was a delegate to the late General Conference at New Orleans, and at the time of his death was presiding elder of the Winchester district.

A VENERABLE PARTY.—On the day before Christmas day, the Rev. Mr. Judd, curate of St. Paul's Cambridge, entertained twelve old ladies, his parishioners, to dinner and tea, and provided them with other good things appropriate to the season. Their united ages amounted to one thousand years, but the venerable dames managed to spend a very merry afternoon notwithstanding.

FROM OTHER CHURCHES.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, NORTH.
Rev. William Taylor, known as the California street preacher, in a note to Poe & Hitchcock, under date of January 10th, says: "I am now working in City-road, London. You are trying to pay Ireland what you owe her for Philip Embury and the rest; what are you doing or going to do for England, for Dr. Coke, Asbury, and smaller favors rendered yearly ever since?"

Dr. Strickland, the editor of Dr. Peter Cartwright's Autobiography, and Finley's Sketches of Western Methodism, has gone over to the Presbyterian Church.

Zion's Herald says: "We understand that there are some eight or ten Methodist students in the Union Theological Seminary (Presbyterian) at New York, preparing themselves for the Methodist ministry."

Rev. Samuel S. Monroe, D. D., of Philadelphia, met with a sad fate on Saturday, while on his way to New York. It is supposed that he was taken ill on the ears, and going on the platform for air, fell off in a fainting fit. He was not missed from the train, nor was his body found until the next train came along, when it was discovered that his neck was broken. He was about fifty years of age, and had been in the ministry since 1843. During this time he has been connected with the Methodist Church of New Jersey, and has held most important appointments within its limits. At the time of his death he was corresponding secretary of the Methodist Episcopal Society. As a preacher he ranked as one of the most prominent in his State.

AMERICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.
There are in the bounds of this connection one hundred thousand members, and over four hundred preachers, actively engaged in the itinerant work. Their denominational enterprises are a Missionary Society—a Book Concern and a Theological Institute.

BAPTIST.
The Baptist church on Shot street, Lexington, Ky., was burned on Sunday morning. The fire is supposed to have caught from the furnace of some tinner who had been repairing the roof. The building had been completed a year, and cost $43,000—on a gold basis. There was only $5,000 insurance.

Rev. J. A. Smith, D. D., in a communication to Western Pulpit, furnishes these statistics: Regular Baptist, 1,040,303; Disciples, Campbellites, 300,000; Freewill Bap., 56,738; Seventh-Day Baptists, 6,686; Six Principles Baptists, 3,000; Wimebrennarians, 23,800; Antimission Baptists, 50,000; Christians, 33,640; Dunkers, 20,000. Total, 1,544,167. Of these the "Christians" reject the doctrines of the Trinity, and the Campbellites undervalue Christian experience, holding faith to be an intellectual assent to the truth.

SCOTLAND-UNION.—The agitation for Presbyterian re-union is flagging. Large numbers of the United Presbyterians do not wish it, and some of them complain that the clergy are placing them in a false position by the negotiations. The ultra Free Churchmen are still loud in opposition, and Dr. Begg, in the Free Presbytery of Edinburgh, has moved an overture to the effect that entering into any union the General Assembly should make provision for the maintenance of Free church principles.

PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY IN MADAGASCAR.—In church fellowship there are now forty-three hundred and seventy four persons, representing a total Christian population of between sixteen and eighteen thousand. Some of the Bibles which were presented by the first missionaries—almost forty years ago—were preserved and often stealthily read during Ranavalona's long reign. One of the present missionaries obtained a copy which had been carefully read by the people. In the time of the persecution they seem to have had intelligent and pious men to instruct and guide them.

LATEST NEWS.

[Special to the N. O. Crescent.]
WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—House. The naval appropriation bill was considered in committee of the whole. Pensacola gets $80,000. The committee rose and the bill passed. The total amount appropriated is sixteen and a quarter millions.

The House went into committee of the whole on the tariff bill. The Western men made a persistent fight on the protection of raw material.

Senate.—The bill removing cases involving over five hundred dollars from the State to the federal courts, on the affidavit of either party, passed.

The consideration of the civil appropriation bill was resumed.

Several senators maintained that in view of the threats of the President's organs and spokesmen, it was necessary for Congress to surround itself with friends. This question originated on the consideration of the appropriation for a superintendent of the capitol buildings. It was claimed that the Senate should have the appointment of this functionary.

Gen. Grant expresses a determination to secure an early and through enforcement of the military bill, and he desires that harmony should exist between the Southern executives and the army officers, in order that difficulties may not arise between them in reference to the execution of its provisions.

The reason Gov. Swann's declining the United States senatorship, to which he was lately elected, and retaining the governorship of Maryland, is understood to be that he had ascertained that the radicals in Congress were unanimous in their determination to have his election contested, to refer the subject to a packed committee, and to proceed in the same manner as they did in the Stockton case.

The President did not send in the veto of the military bill to-day, on account of an anxiety to have it carefully revised. It is understood that the attorney general has contributed largely to the composition of the document.

The Democrats, it is said, will not resort to parliamentary tactics for the purpose of preventing the passage of the bill during the present session, unless the President should delay sending it in until the very end of the week. Against their being able to succeed in that event, the radicals have provided by a most nefarious project. This is to meet the first motion made by the supporters of the veto, by objecting to it as out of order;—the speaker will necessarily pronounce the motion in order, because none which is not so will be made; but some radical will nevertheless appeal from the decision of the chair, and the oligarchy will sustain the point of order, and prevent the motion being put, as out of order. The speaker, Colfax himself, is said to be the adviser of this characteristic proceeding.

NEW YORK, Feb. 27.—A Fenian emissary, recently arrived from Ireland, denies that the organization it suppressed in that island. On the contrary, he says the brotherhood is now stronger than it has ever been. The men are drilling constantly, under four hundred ex-federal soldiers. The English troops will march whenever they are ordered, but will not fire on the revolutionists.

ARRAIGNMENT OF SURRETT.—Surrett was arraigned on the 23d before the criminal court, attired in a suit of black. When brought into court his hands were handcuffed, but at the request of counsel the court ordered them released, and the indictment was read by the clerk. Surrett entered a plea of not guilty. The clerk asked: "How will you be tried?" when he said, "by my countrymen" when the officer added, "then may God send you a safe deliverance." The handcuffs were replaced and the prisoner remanded to jail. No excitement was manifested during his presence in court.

ALBANY, N. Y., Feb. 27.—Judge Dean to-day, before Gov. Fenton, argued against the rendition of Capt. Olney, under the requisition of the governor of Virginia, on the ground that if Virginia is no longer a State, the constitutional provision for the rendition of accused persons does not apply to her.

Later from Vera Cruz.
Southwest Pass, Feb. 27.—Passengers by the steamer Key West, which left Vera Cruz on the 24th inst., report that the greatest confusion prevails in that city and neighborhood. All communication with the city of Mexico is cut off. The Liberals hold all the important lines of communication and by their prompt action have thrown the Imperialists into dismay.

The French transports have all arrived. A French naval force, among which is one iron-clad, has also recently arrived at Vera Cruz to protect the embarkation of the French troops.

Foreigners are leaving the country as fast as possible. It is believed that Maximilian will, himself, leave at no distant period perhaps within ten days.

Death of Mr. DeBow.
WASHINGTON, Feb. 28.—J. D. B. DeBow, editor of De Bow's Review, is dead.

Confirmation of Miramon's Defeat.—The Veto.—The Tariff Bill, Etc.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28.—Minister Romero has received an autograph letter from Escobedo, confirmatory of Miramon's defeat at Zacatecas.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28.—The President and the Attorney General have been in consultation during the entire day on the veto message. The interest in regard to this document is intense.

It is currently reported that the Judiciary Committee have submitted their accumulated evidence to eminent legal talent. The opinion of the lawyers, it is said, favors the feasibility of impeachment.

The friends of the tariff bill are in despair, and the Democrats are jubilant over the victory obtained by the defection of the Western Republicans. The combination of these with the Democrats comprises over one-third of the House, which keeps the bill before the Committee of the Whole.

The President has signed the bill giving Government employes an advance of twenty per cent on their salaries, counting from July last.

The President will veto the tenure of office and military appropriation bills. The amendment which gives the General of the army peculiar powers, has already been reported. Another amendment disbands the militia of the unconquered States.

The Democrats had a jollification over the refusal of the Ohio Legislature, by a decided majority, to strike the world white from the franchise laws.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28.—Governor Fenton submits the case of Capt. Olney, arrested under a requisition from the Governor of Virginia, to Attorney General Martindale.

The Supreme Court of Alabama decides that the emancipation proclamation is imperative, but was inoperative in Alabama until May, 1863.

The Secretary of the Treasury has information of an organization of English merchants to smuggle goods through Canada.

The Tax bill is up in the Senate. In view of the failure of the Tariff bill, the Senatorial concurrence in the House reduction is regarded as improbable.

The House refused to concur in the Senate bill authorizing one hundred million three per cent loan certificates to redeem compound interest notes. A conference committee was appointed.

The House refused, by 9 majority, to table the bankrupt bill, and appointed a committee of conference. The action is regarded by the friend of the bill as a certain indication of its passage.

A number of new members of the Fortieth Congress have arrived.

LEGISLATURE OF LOUISIANA.

House of Representatives.—Mr. Kidd called up his resolution offered yesterday, and having been amended on suggestion of Mr. Elam, with the approval of Mr. Kidd, was adopted, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana, in General Assembly convened, That the judiciary committee of the House and Senate be instructed to investigate jointly and report, as early as practicable, the best and most expeditious method of testing, before the Supreme Court of the United States, the constitutionality of the act of Congress lately passed, entitled "A bill for the more efficient government of the late so-called Confederate States" in the event that said bill should become a law.

Mr. Montgomery, chairman of the committee on internal improvements, reported:

1. On the bill marking an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of Red river, favorably, with amendments.

The bill providing for a Convention to frame a new Constitution, was called up, and after some discussion passed.

Every thing in the last few years has shown us that a deeper tone of divine truth in all who profess to hold that truth, is needed to meet the growing corruption of religion, and the infidelity and lawlessness which casts off all religion. God's own light, as given us in His Word, must be more and more, our guide through the darkness and conflicts of these days. We are assured also, that "when the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him." We may expect, therefore, fresh truth to shine out from the Sacred Volume. The word of prophecy in general, and especially the hope of the Lord's coming, is as a "light shining in a dark place."—Rev. E. Bicknell.

CITY NEWS.

DOLBEAR COMMERCIAL COLLEGE.
The thirty-fifth anniversary of this institution was celebrated on Tuesday evening, the 26th, at the Lyceum Hall, in the City Hall building. The spacious hall was crowded with a gay, cheerful, and appreciative audience. The exercises were opened with prayer, by Dr. Walker. Prof. Dolbear made a brief, spirited, and appropriate address. Dr. Palmer, made a most instructive and useful address to the graduating class, which, we think, cannot fail to benefit the young gentlemen to whom it was addressed. Mr. George A. Jones, of Alabama, one of the graduating class delivered the valedictory. His theme, he said, was suggested by the needs of our country. He urged the young men to diligence, never to forsake their country, and never to despair.

The anniversary oration was by the Hon. Chas. Gayarre. It was worthy of the occasion and the man. The evening was enlivened by the sweet and string strains of a skillful band. Altogether the occasion was one of interest, and will not soon be forgotten.

MARRIED.
By the Rev. Chas. P. Evans, on Tuesday evening, Feb. 26th, 1867, at the house of the bride's sister, Mrs. P. E. Davis. Mr. WINCHESTER MASON to Miss MARY VIRGINIA WALLACE, both of Baltimore, Md.

OBITUARIES.
ROBERT MORRIS, was born in Tennessee, March 17th, 1817, and died in Jefferson city, La., February 12, 1867. Probably the death of no one could have more sorely bereaved the community than his, for besides a large circle of personal friends, many who in business learned to respect his virtues, and even children who coveted his smiles, felt afflicted by his loss, and wept to see the good man go. Nor was this attachment capricious, for he possessed a happy combination of qualities to attract the regard, and secure the friendship of others. He was independent, yet generous, candid without clamor, and though energetic, unobtrusive. He always approached an object by a straight line, and seemed to be impregnable in his conscious integrity of purpose. Indeed, nothing more truly daguerreotypes his character than this, for in opinion and desire, and purpose, and in their manifestation and enjoyment, honesty seemed a distinguishing feature. He was a man who felt obliged to do his duty. Doubtless some obliquities marked his course, but since Abraham, the "Friend of God," diverged from rectitude, they can be no detractor from his claim to our love, and the justice of this memorial. He was for many years a member of the Church, and appreciated the services of the Sanctuary, seldom failing to occupy his accustomed seat. Though in bad health, he often trudged the weary distance in falling showers, and over slippery paths. Nor was worship a Sabbath task assumed as an irksome but indispensable necessity. The "family Bible that lay on the stand," was nightly opened before the assembled household, and grateful acknowledgment, and ardent supplication, commended them to the mercies of God.

Like a "good Samaritan" he visited the sick, entertained the stranger, and by words of cheer, and aims of love, comforted the faint, and raised the fallen. The folios of many a record, and the leaves of many a life, preserve thankful reminiscences of his manifold care.

What grief must it bring to his loved ones, to part with so noble a husband and father: May the Saviour visit them, as he did—the family in Bethany, and in thus separating the tendrils of the vine from their earthly staff, twine them around himself in Heaven: and may His blessing rest upon the brethren who in so short a time, have seen two of their number anticipate them in death, and depart to their reward.

CHAS. F. EVANS.

Died, Feb. 4th, 1867, at the house of her daughter, Mrs. Dr. Thigpen, in Many, Louisiana, Sister NANCY HAWKINS, of De Soto parish, Louisiana, aged fifty-eight years. Sister Hawkins, was a native of North Carolina, came to Alabama in 1833, and thence to Natchitoches parish, La., in 1858, where she lived until 1863, when she moved with her son J. E. Hawkins, to De Soto parish.

For forty years sister Hawkins had been an exemplary member of the M. E. Church South. She enjoyed much of the spirit and power of religion. Her long and devoted life, was a continued evidence of the truth and spirituality of religion, known and read of all, who had the pleasure of her acquaintance. At a protracted meeting, last fall, two of her sons presented themselves at the altar; the mother's prayer was heard, and in loud exclamations of praise, she gave God the glory, that the prayers for her children were answered. She lived to see all her children become religious. When she came to press a dying pillow, death having lost its terror, she was calm, conscious, and resigned. She talked of loved ones gone before, and said in her last moments that soon she would join them in the heaven, of the Christian hopes. She's gone, but we need not sorrow as those who have no hope.

WILLIAM ATKIN LEAKE, son of Dr. Wm. S. Leake, was born in Monroe county, Miss., May 28th, 1848. He professed saving faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and joined the M. E. Church, South, in Washita county, Ark., Sept. 1860. Too young to enter the army, he remained at home, the protection and support of the family during his father's absence in the service of the Confederate States. Those who knew him, bear witness that he never swerved from his Christian integrity to the hour of his death, which occurred by a sudden stroke of providence on the 12th of Feb. 1867. On the morning of this day, he left home, in fine health and buoyant spirits, to convey a load of produce to New Iberia, a distance of five miles. Near the town, some bird hunters carelessly fired, into a tree, over his horses, at which they took fright, and the young man attempting to jump from the wagon, fell, and the loaded wagon passed over his breast. He lived about six hours after this dreadful accident. On the following day his funeral was preached by the writer, from 2 Sam 12th, ch. 23d verse, and his remains were followed to the grave by a large company of citizens and friends.

NEW SOUTHERN MUSIC BOOK.
Just published
TABOR;
Or the Richmond Collection of Sacred Music.
By R. McINTOSH, of Virginia.
The attention of Choral and Musical Societies generally is respectfully asked for this new and popular collection of Church Music. The author, for four years an officer in the Confederate Army composed many pieces in moments snatched during its marching and counter-marchings. The dirge at the funeral of Gen. T. J. Jackson (Stone-wall) May 17, 1863, was from his pen, and is included in this collection.
Says the Richmond Whig: "The writer is well known throughout the South as an author of finished excellence; a musical reputation rarely attained at the head of Church Music, no one disputing the position with him, and besides is, and ever has been, one of us."
Says the Spartansburg (S. C.) Express: "After a careful examination of TABOR, we have no hesitation in pronouncing it a Musical Gem. Its original compositions give the work a distinctive character, while the selections embrace those good old times which have come down from our fathers as an invaluable legacy. Here, also, may be found a number of traditional melodies, which, for half a century or more, have been sung throughout the South and Southwest, and never before in print. We can heartily recommend it to Churches, Choral, and all lovers of Sacred Music."
It has been largely introduced, and highly recommended by many of the Churches in Richmond and Petersburg, where the author is best known. It embraces all the metres in use, in every key and variety of measure, with a full elementary department and fine collection of new anthems, set pieces, and sentences. It contains nearly 300 closely printed pages, neatly and tastefully gotten up, well printed and bound.
Price—retail, $1 33; $12 00 per dozen.
Can be obtained through all booksellers, or will be mailed by the Publishers to any part of the United States, post free, on receipt of retail price.

DUPLEX ELLIPTICAL
[Or, Double Spring]

SKIRT!

HEY WILL NOT BEND OR BREAK

the Single Spring, but will preserve their shape and graceful shape when three or four Binary Skirts are thrown aside as useless—
they are the CHEAPEST.

Each Hoop is made by braiding two springs
together, edge to edge, forming the STRONG-EST, most FLEXIBLE, and still the LIGHT-
EST Hoop made.

In fact, for promenade, or the house, or the church, the theatre, or for crowded assemblies, broad cars, carriages, etc., they are superior to all others, affording COMFORT TO THE WEARER, with that ELEGANCE OF SHAPE which wins favor with all, and has made this "DUPLEX ELLIPTIC"

the Standard Skirt of the Fashionable World.

For misses and young ladies they are superior to all others.

For Sale Everywhere.

Manufactured exclusively by the owners of the Patent.

WESTS, BRADLEY & CARY,
Chambers, 79 and 81 Leade sts, New York.

CAUTION.

The Duplex Skirt will admit a pin being run through the centre of each hoop, thereby providing two SPRINGS braided together, which is the secret of their remarkable LENGTH and FLEXIBILITY—a combination not possessed by any SINGLE-SPRING
skirt.

See the red ink stamp, viz: "J W BRADLEY'S Duplex Skirt Springs" will be found upon each and every Skirt; none other are genuine.

Cartes de Visite,

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

Since the publication of our last number the general market has evinced only moderate animation, although several of the leading articles have undergone a material alteration. Sugar and Molasses have been in less active demand, at higher prices for the latter, and the movement in Western Produce has been limited, attended with an easier feeling in Flour and Corn, and a decline in Pork; while operations in our leading staple have been rather restricted, and under the influence of unfavorable advice from Liverpool and New York, prices have eased off, the market closing at our quotations yesterday, with a tendency to further weakness.

COTTON—On Saturday, the market opened under the adverse influence of a decline at Liverpool and York, but subsequently the advice from the former being more favorable, a better feeling obtained, and sales to the amount of 5800 bales were effected, at prices within the range of previous quotations. On Monday, notwithstanding holders were willing to concede, most buyers were loth to operate, being restrained by the discouraging tenor of the foreign and domestic news, and consequently the sales were restricted, comprising barely 6400 bales, at earlier prices. Yesterday, owing to the continued unfavorable advice from Liverpool and New York, the movement exhibited little activity throughout, and hence the sales were light, running up barely 5200 bales, at prices disclosing greater ease, the market closing decidedly weak, at our quotations.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 15,400 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 7511 bales, against 13,534 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 6023 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the last of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas) are 554,239 bales, against 491,848 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 28,722 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 52,398 bales to Great Britain, of 28,735 to France, and an increase of 11,235 bales to other foreign ports.

TOBACCO—The stock on sale is so small that there is little or no room for making selections or filling orders. Only a few small lots of the new crop have so far been received, and were sold at once. The transactions during the past three days have been confined to 40 hogheads, of which one Medium Leaf at 7c, 3 Large at 3 1/2c, 1 Frosted at 2c, 15 Good Light Leaf at 8c, 1 New Clarksville Leaf at 4c, 1 New Fair Clarksville Leaf at 6 1/2c, 1 at 7c, 2 Good Leaf at 8 1/2c, 1 Low Leaf at 4 1/2c, and 1 New Leaf at 5c. We repeat our previous quotations for reference.

FLLOUR—The market has been quiet but steady, with a fair local demand. The sales on Saturday and Sunday were confined to 4000 barrels at $10 50 to $10 75 per bbl for Fine, $11 40 to $11 62 1/2 for Superfine, $12 12 1/2 to $12 25 for Single Extra, $13 25 to $14 25 for Double Extra, $15 12 1/2 to $15 25 for Triple Extra, and $16 to $17 50 per bbl for Choice Extra. Yesterday there were sales of 2000 barrels at $9 50 for Common, $11 40 to $11 50 for Superfine, $13 to $13 50 for Double Extra, and $16 15 to $16 50 per bbl for Choice Extra. Arrived during the past three days 11,727 bbls. Cleared for Texas 340, Minutian 195 bbls.

The Coin market has been quiet, the fluctuations attending the course of prices at New York restraining most dealers from operating. Gold opened on Saturday nominally at 138 1/2, but subsequently receded and closed weak at 138 1/2 to 139 1/2; it opened on Monday at 139 1/2, at a later hour declining, but afterwards rallying, and closing steady at the opening rate, and opened yesterday at 138 1/2 to 139 1/2, but later in the day improved and closed firm at 139 1/2 to 139 3/4.

CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE

ORGAN OF THE M. E. CHURCH SOUTH FOR THE MOBILE, MONTGOMERY, MISSISSIPPI AND LOUISIANA CONFERENCES

NEW ORLEANS, SATURDAY, MARCH 9, 1867.

$3.00 A YEAR IN ADVANCE.
OFFICE—113 CAMP STREET.

From the Good Words.

CALVARY.

Pale lamps are twinkling through the town;
The melancholy cry
From the mosque's fretted balcony Flaunts forth on high.
Else, all around broods silence of the grave;
Steals o'er sandy bar the ripple of a wave;
No forest leaves are rustling in the night,
No chariot-wheels roll by in gleamy flight;
The Christian's church droops near the Moslem's dome.
Is this Jerusalem?—earth's wreck, yet Israel's home?
Magnificent in gloom the city lies—
The Rhipah of the past, with widow'd eyes,
Scaring oblivion's vultures from her dead—
Queen of a world-old grief—a kingdom fled!
A dull weight beats my brain—I may not stay
Past the blue Mosque of Omar lies my way.
This is the blessed Easter-tide, when pilgrims
Rock
To the lone Calvary beneath the rock.
The young and old and beautiful are here;
The marble steps are wet with many a tear.
This gaily hand I place upon Thy shrine
And plead the presence of a "death divine"
In the deep shadow of my Saviour's cross
All earthly cares to me seem very loss.
The priest's rich robe, the silvery lamp-light, stream.
The glory all around me is a dream.

I see two figures only in the past:
My Saviour, Meeking in the sultry blast;
Myself, beneath his cross in harden'd mood,
Mocking Him in his awful solitude.
Those pleading eyes still haunt my aching brain;
Was I a Fiend to mock Him in his pain?
Childhood and youth and manhood were the hills—
My spirit dies in self-reproachful walls.

Here, 'neath the shadow of his cross I learn Homewards, but by another way, to turn.
A thousand deaths for Him I fain would die,
Rather than meet again his mournful eye.
O Calvary!—O Calvary!
May I not seek thy lonely hill of hope?
May I not plant my cross upon thy slope?
O Redeem! sighing by Grace's kindly town,
I seek a cross for Jesus, not a crown.

ALAN BRODIE.

BRITISH HONDURAS.

Dr. D. W. FOSTER—
Dear Sir: Your valued favor of the 26th inst. is at hand requesting a reply to reach you by the 2d January prox., and I hasten to reply, as fully as circumstances will permit, to the exclusion of all else, even matters of pressing importance to me. You proposed the following questions:

- 1st. What will be the cost of emigration?
- 2d. What will be the cost of lands?
- 3d. What is the situation and locality of the best lands?
- 4th. What is the opportunity of improving them?
- 5th. What is the character of the laborers?
- 6th. What is the character of the population generally?
- 7th. What is the cost of living there?
- 8th. What is the nature and value of the productions?
- 9th. How could a living be soon made there?

No. 1. Cost of emigration will depend upon locality, number of persons, quantity of effects, furniture, etc., etc., which each family would desire to take. Once in this city the rate of passage from here to Belize, British Honduras, in schooners, $30, gold for each grown person; and rate of freight $1 per bbl. of 5 cubic feet. After reaching Belize, the expense of living would depend, to a great extent, upon the management of each family. The cost of flour ranges from $10 to $15, coin; or, usually, the same price there in coin that it costs here in greenbacks.

There you can procure sugar at 34c. per lb.; coffee at 25c. per lb.; rice at 8 to 9c. per lb.; beef at 6c. per lb.; fresh pork 12c. Mess pork, per bbl., cost in coin there equal to greenbacks here. Mutton is scarce and very high, 25c. per lb.; yams, a good substitute for Irish potatoes, very cheap; lard from 13c. to 25c. per lb., according to supply and demand. Every variety of fresh fish, of the most superior quality, at very low prices—21c. cents will furnish a full meal for four persons; green-turtle at 61c. per lb. Shoes, clothing, etc., costs about one-half of what they do here. As there are no public hotels in Belize, and only two persons who take boarders, one of which charges for transient boarders $2 per day, the other $40 per month, it would be inconvenient for a number of families; and the best course would be to take a large house together, and hire their servants, which can be procured at from $6 to $8 per month (though they are usually indifferent house-servants.) Fire-wood and charcoal, which are required for no other purpose than cooking and ironing, are always convenient. Thus the aggregate expenses of each would depend, to a considerable extent, upon their own management, and duration of their stay in Belize.

Every variety of tropical fruit is very low. Bananas 50c. per bunch, and everything in proportion.

2d. The large land holders do not wish to sell in tracts of less than 10,000 to 12,000 acres in a body, which they have proposed to do at 50 cents per acre, on five years credit; and as each mahogany tree on the land is worth $4 as it stands, I think, in most localities, that wood alone will pay for the land and clearing. The price of crown lands has been limited to $5 per acre for arable lands, but measures have been adopted which I think will result in their being reduced to as low as 50c. per acre.

An estate on Lake Manatee, the scenery of which is most beautiful, being a combination of mountain, plain and lake, on which was already planted some 6,000 coffee plants and 7,000 plantains, with a plain two-story house and an open building for mechanical purposes, and a fine range for 2,000 head of cattle. The whole extent of land is about 40,000 acres, all of which was offered to me at $16,000, and I think it could be bought now at $10,000 or $12,000.

3d. Not having had a fair opportunity of examining all of the lands, I cannot say where the best lands are located, though as fertile as any in any country can be had in all parts of the colony. Those above Belize river are low and flat like those of Louisiana. The streams are sluggish like our bayous and never overflow their upper banks. The land lays in large tracts, while below Belize the country is mountainous, and the most fertile and arable lands lay along the mountain streams; and the extent of them in depth is generally unknown, but certainly their area does not equal that of the tracts in the northern districts. The land lays in strata along these streams, which overflow from mountain torrents the second, third and fourth strata, but very seldom, indeed, overflow the upper strata, which would be under cultivation. The water rises with great rapidity and falls as rapidly, seldom or ever submerging even the lower strata exceeding 24 hours; and these overflows are exceedingly beneficial to certain plants; for instance, the plantain, sugar cane, and rice. I was shown a piece of land in sugar cane which they told me had ratooned 60 years under this process. Different persons would, of course, entertain different opinions as to different localities.

4th. The country is a wilderness, and the opportunities of improving those lands is just such as appertain to most new countries where there are no roads and public highways, or such navigable streams as we have in this country.

5th. The laborers are the natives of British Honduras and adjacent States, Musquitomen, Coribs and Yucateans, and the other creoles of the country. Chinese, Coolies, or any other class of laborers can be introduced into the country under the immigration laws of the colony, by which their services may be secured for five years. A large majority of the laborers are as civil and submissive to a white man as the slaves of the South ever were, though their system of labor differs materially, almost everything being done by task work. For those of our planters who would desire to commence planting on a large scale, I do not think, if many went into the country at one time, there would be an adequate supply of labor, as the present population does not exceed 30,000; but I think that 1,000 planters could each have at least ten to twenty hands in six to eight months after their arrival in the country, if they had means to pay them. There would be no scarcity of labor if a regular demand existed for it, in my opinion.

6th. Of the entire population there is not exceeding 1,000 whites, who are mostly bachelors from England and Scotland.

The whole population are friendly to Southerners, and in our late struggle were in favor of the South, even the negroes. It is a mixed population, but there are some Europeans in Belize, who are highly educated and refined, whose company would be desirable in any country; and with those now going into the country there will be as much society as I desire to have.

7th. Has been partly answered in No. 1, with the exception of rents in Belize, which range from $20 to $60 per month, according to size and location; and every variety of poultry thrives, and can be had at say $6 per dozen for chickens, $1 for turkey hens and $1 25 to $1 50c. for gobblers.

8th. The productions of nature, now growing on the soil, are almost every species of cabinet woods, dye woods, and it is said over fifty kinds of tropical fruits, and many medicinal plants, herbs and trees, cacao (from which the chocolate is manufactured.) The agricultural products are sugar (the cane grown without cultivation and ratoons twenty years, and yields from 12 tons—of 2,240 lbs.—to three tons of sugar per acre. It blossoms every year, consequently matures and is much richer in Saccharine than Louisiana cane), which is a certain crop. Cotton not so certain as sugar. Coffee, which does not yield until five years after it has been planted, after which it yields thirty to forty years; tobacco, indigo, arrowroot, rice (two crops per year on the same lands, high or low without irrigation), corn, three kinds, maturing in two, three and four months from date of planting respectively, two crops of each of which can be raised on the same land per year certainly, sweet potatoes, yams—every variety of vegetables that grow in Louisiana.

Belize is a place of considerable commercial importance, and has constant communication with Liverpool, New York, Baltimore, New Orleans, all of which are markets, in which the various products of Honduras meet with ready sale.

9th. A family composed of a man, wife and five or six children should have at least $500 or $600 cash to start with. Say they would commence upon ten acres of land, the man dependent solely upon his own labor (after he shall have had his land cleared.) He shall by all means have it cleared by the laborers of the country at from ten to fifteen dollars per acre. The natives would build him a house of the material growing on the land large enough for his family for $50 perhaps less; and he should, by all means, have a plank floor in it, which would cost $150 more, price of lumber in that country being high. When he would go into his house he should take with him some poultry and hogs, and retain one acre for his house grounds and garden. His first step would be to plant such vegetables as he would wish, then plant an acre in two, another in three, and another in four months corn. This will give him a supply for his family and stock for the year, and leave him the second crop, which can be raised on the same land, for market. The fifth acre he would plant in rice, which in four months will yield him from 2,000 to 3,000 lbs. of rice, of which he can reserve sufficient to serve his family for a year—say one bbl. of 250 lbs., and it leaves him the remainder to sell in the rough at 4c., or cleaned from 6c. to 8c. per pound. Another crop of rice can be grown on the same land the first year, all of which he would have for market. Plantain is an article of food for man and beast, and always finds ready sale in Belize at from 37c. to $1 per hundred. The man would have five acres unplanted. This he could plant with plantains, succors for which would cost him $15 per acre. In seven months after they have been planted he can gather the crop (by cutting down the trees), from which he will realize, at the lowest market rates, I am informed, $75 per acre; but place it at $50 per acre, and it will give him at least $250 with which to employ labor the next year, and enlarge his operations. The clothing for himself and family being so light the product of surplus corn and rice would more than purchase it all.

I am assuming that he will conform to the "style of cultivation peculiar to the country," that is, with a pointed stick open a hole in the ground and plant his corn and rice, and let them grow by nature.

The rice would have to be cleaned the first three weeks after it commences growing. In this way not over two-thirds of his time need be occupied. During his leisure moments he could adorn his house with shade trees, both ornamental and profitable, such as the tamarind, almond, bread fruit, orange, lemon, lime, gnava, citron, and many others; so that, in a few years, he could have a home of luxury, such as no amount of money could procure him in most parts of the world. There are some things which all of our people will find objectionable. The troops stationed in Belize, and the police, are negroes, commanded by white officers. They are always polite and civil to all and are never indecorous in their conduct.

The country is a wilderness, and I have not had an opportunity of exploring it as I desired to do.

Animals for agricultural purposes can be procured from the adjacent States, there being but few raised in that colony. There is no good reason why there should not be an abundant supply.

I am writing hurriedly, amid frequent interruptions, persons talking to and all-around me, several having come in to inquire of the very subjects I am writing to you, continually. I trust you will excuse incoherency of expression, errors, blots, etc., etc.

Could you not visit me? In an "uninterrupted" conversation of three or four hours I could explain to you fully all that I know, what I have seen, what I think of the present and future of the country—all of which I cannot do as satisfactorily and fully in a dozen letters. I have a map of the colony showing the position of the mountains, the rivers, etc.; and I believe I could give you information which will be of great value to you and those who want to emigrate. Regarding that I cannot reply to you myself, I am, in haste, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES M. PUTNAM.

P. S. Hope I may have the pleasure of meeting you ere long.

From the Charlottesville (Va.) Chronicle.
The Faro Bank as an Engine of Christian Beneficence.

Some progress has been made by our Christian men and women in devising ingenious financial schemes for raising money for the families and orphans of our Southern soldiers and for enclosing our soldiers' graves, and we are happy to know they have met with considerable success. The happy conception of procuring a great many nice articles, collecting them in a spacious hall, and then raffling them off at an enormous profit, is originally due to the managers of the late Great Southern Fair in Baltimore. One single Bible, donated by some godly lady of that city, realized one thousand dollars—and if the American Bible Society had any true sympathy with the physical sufferings of the Southern people, they might have sent on a large number of handsome Bibles to be disposed of in the same way. A lady acquaintance of ours showed us a short time since a batch of Lottery tickets which had been sent her by a lady friend of hers in Richmond, to be sold in Charlottesville for the benefit of the Hollywood Memorial Association, which is going to have a "Bazaar" on the 4th of February in Richmond. One of these tickets (price only one dollar) entitles the holder to "the article with the corresponding number attached to it, which may be found on the Kentucky table"—and in the left hand corner in heavy type is printed "No Blanks." On the back of the card, enclosed in an ellipse, the announcement is made that "Articles of great value will be distributed—Sewing Machines, Oil Paintings, a Piano worth $1,000, Embroidered Chairs, Ottomans, Screens, Tables, etc. Some of which have been sent from London and Paris."

Stimulated no doubt by the success of the Baltimore Fair, and the brilliant programme of the Hollywood Bazaar, another great company of Philanthropists have entered the lists with a scheme of prizes that will throw all similar enterprises pretty much in the shade. The Southern Orphan Association is designed to erect an Asylum in Richmond for the orphan children of the soldiers of the whole South; and their scale of operations is extensive in proportion to the largeness of their plans. Generals Rosser and Wise delivered addresses in one of the Methodist Churches in Richmond on Monday night last in behalf of this association. The sale of the tickets commenced on Wednesday in the office formerly occupied by those eminent brokers, Purcell & Co., and "on yesterday," says the Dispatch of Thursday, "a number of our prominent citizens took shares." "Among them," it adds, "was an eminent divine of this city, who took a number, and declared his intention of returning to the Davis mansion to the orphans should he be so lucky as to draw it." The first prize in this splendid lottery is to be the late mansion of the Southern Ex-President; the second, Stratford House, in Westmoreland country, with 2,500 acres of land, "the colonial homestead of the Lees"; the third and fourth, "valuable tracts of land." Stratford House has been just purchased by the Association through Mr. W. B. Robins, real estate agent. The scheme of the Association comprises the sale of 500,000 tickets at one dollar each, and the distribution of 2,004 prizes, none of which are of less value than $100.

Truly the heart of the Christian patriot must grow bigger as he contemplates these refined and ingenious devices for raising a large charitable fund levied in great measure from the prodigals and speculators of the community. We can but contrast them with the careless, unadorned, and unstimulating appeals of that devout (but unbusiness-like) man of "God, Rev. C. R. Ross, Agent of the Albemarle Sunday School and Colportage Society; or with the dull and rapid procedure at the Presbyterian Church every Sunday morning, where Messrs. Miller and Benner carry around two little baskets, and receive about two dollars and a-half in ten-cent notes; or with the strange and fanatical method of that remarkable man George Muller, who does not go even as far as Mr. Ross or Messrs. Miller and Benner, but only prays to God for money for his Orphan Asylums. The Hollywood Bazaar or the Southern Association will make more money in a day than these gentlemen will get in a year—though George Muller does raise several thousand pounds every year in answer to his prayers.

It is true that Lotteries are prohibited by the Constitution of the State; Article IV., Section 31, declaring that "No lottery shall hereafter be authorized by law; and the buying, selling, or transferring of tickets or chances in any lottery not now authorized by a law of this State shall be prohibited;" and it is true that Chapter CXCIV., of the Code prohibits faro, A B C or E O tables raffling, lotteries, etc.; and declares that any one engaged in conducting or promoting a lottery or raffle shall be confined in jail not more than one year and fined not exceeding five hundred dollars—and declares all money and things of value drawn in any lottery forfeited to the Commonwealth; but we think it likely the "eminent divine" alluded to or some other (male or female) shining light in the Church know what they are about and have so contrived it that it would be tedious, at least, to prosecute the Bazaar or the Association, and very difficult to get a jury to divest the title to the "Presidential Mansion."

There is a great deal of foolish prejudice against dice and cards and horse-racing and gaming-houses and lotteries. It is only betting, and we recall no explicit passage in the Bible against betting. His Holiness the Pope, the Head of the Christian Church, always raises money by lotteries. What is the difference between winning a gentleman's money by turning up a Jack, and winning in the Gold Room of the New York Exchange? No; Christianity (and we take most of the managers of the Hollywood Bazaar, at least, to be widowed ladies who attend Prayer Meetings) is expanding its operations; it is growing more cunning like the serpent (and less harmless than the dove); it is reversing the engine on those children of Mammon who are "wiser in their generation than the children of light"—or used to be; it has got "Young America" in its bones, and is not going to do things any longer in the old humdrum way. A short time since it introduced the opera and the negro minstrelsy into its Church choirs, exclaiming that "it didn't intend for the Devil to have all the good tunes;" now it is going to run a muck with the Faro Banks, and exclaims, "it doesn't intend for the Devil to get all the one dollar bills."

We feel quite sure that the Hollywood Bazaar, and the Southern Association will succeed, and we have nothing to recommend to them. But, as this line of business will soon be overdone by competing associations (for every Sunday School will have its lottery to buy Testaments and Harmoniums,) we would suggest an application of the system. We remember that just at this moment the Presbyterian Sunday School in this place wants a library; get some good card-player to come here, and open a faro bank, inviting the ladies and gentlemen and children of the town to go there and bet. Or get our old friend, William Dudley, to get up a quarter-race—all the money won to be handed over for the benefit of the P. S. S. Library Association. Of course these faro banks and race-courses, etc., are to be strictly moral entertainments—indeed, we would go further; we would have them opened and closed with Prayer, and some "eminent divine" who had "taken a number of tickets" might deliver a little Exhortation (if a race) from the text, "Ye did run well; who did hinder you that ye should not obey the truth?"—(if a bazaar) from the text, "But covet earnestly the best gifts."

PASTORAL ADDRESS.

TO THE COLORED MEMBERS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, IN THE ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

The Mobile Conference, at its late session, requested me, as its presiding officer, to draw up and have presented to you a Pastoral Address. It gives me pleasure to perform this duty. I shall speak to you plainly, in terms which you will understand, on subjects which deeply concern you, and in a spirit of kindest interest. I represent the feeling of all the preachers, and with them wish to see you contented, industrious, happy; and above all, and including all, truly religious. Your spiritual welfare in particular is what your old pastors most earnestly desire to witness and promote. They are willing still to labor, to the largest extent, for the good of your souls; and in doing this, they are sure they are doing the very best thing for you that can be done in the circumstances in which the providence of God has now placed you.

Their pastoral care in former years, gathered you, not out of the spoils of other churches, but out of the world that lieth in wickedness. A few generations ago your forefathers were brought from Africa. They were heathens. They did not know God; they had never heard of Christ; they worshipped devils, feared witches, trembled before the Obia man; were sunk in ignorance, debasement and wretchedness. Christianity, directly and indirectly, has made all the difference between their condition and yours. You were born in a Christian country. You heard the Gospel preached. Churches were open to you. On the large plantations, Christian missionaries labored among you. Christian masters and mistresses were concerned for your souls. You heard of Jesus, the sinner's friend. You were instructed in the way of salvation; were baptised and gathered into the fold of Christ; learned the way to heaven; and set your faces toward the heavenly country.

War came; and your quietness and good conduct won the respect of the white people and endeared you to them. Then came freedom; and with it many inducements to set up for yourselves in church matters, as in other things. Many left their old pastors and their old folds. Some people said "join us and you shall have fine churches, and many other fine things." Other people said, "No, join us: you shall have preachers of your own color; plenty of you want to be preachers, and preach you shall, soon and without trouble—all you in particular who want to be big men." And many went. Some did not go. A few months have shown that, as in many other things, so here; everything that glitters is not exactly gold. Promises are easy to make and easy to break. Some of the rainbows have turned to fog. Big words have ended in small things. And so it has turned out that the people who need to have their souls fed by the Gospel, and who know the difference between husks and genuine bread, became dissatisfied; and hundreds and thousands who had gone off, one way and another, have come back and put themselves under the care of the old shepherds, to be instructed in that form of sound doctrine which makes wise unto salvation and nourishes the soul in the spiritual life and prepares it for a better country, even the heavenly.

What the providence of God may design for the colored people in the future, in this country, and what lies before you in the generations to come, of course we know not. But of some things we may be sure. To us and to you, to our children and yours, it is a matter of concern and interest, first, that the kindest feeling should be cultivated on both sides; second, that you should understand and be sure in your own minds that freedom in itself will be of no practical and lasting good to the colored man unless it is connected with honesty, temperance, industry and thrift; and thirdly, that religion alone is the living root, out of which all these virtues grow.

1. Why should there not be kind feelings on the part of the white people towards you. You live in the same country with them, and have always done so. With possibly here and there an exception, have they not always treated you well in the past? Do they not feel as much interest in you, as sincere a desire that you may do well as people who never saw and never knew you could possibly do? I know what I am saying when I tell you that the truest and best friends you have in the world are the white folks with whom you have grown up. They wish to see you contented and happy, doing well, and making the best you can out of your freedom. If you believe this, I am sure you, on your side, will be careful to cultivate the kindest feelings in return. You will consider it worth your while to show by your conduct that you mean to prove yourselves worthy of the respect and confidence of the white people. They can help you—you can, in some important respects, help them. Bonds of common interest unite both parties. Let the tie of good feelings be added.

2. Your freedom will do you good only so far as you learn and know how to control yourselves. There are millions of free people in other countries—tens of thousands in our own country—who have to fight poverty, starvation, distress, in a hand-to-hand battle every day. Freedom in itself and by itself puts no bread in peoples' mouths, no clothes on their backs, no shoes on their feet. If they are sick, freedom cannot cure them, without a doctor. If they are shelterless, freedom gives them no house. Bond and free alike have to meet death and stand before the Judgment-seat. In Dr. Paul's time freedom was made by some "a cloak of maliciousness." In our time by some it is made a cloak to cover all the evils to which man is subject; a sort of good that is to do all possible good things for the world. Mistakes of this sort do not, indeed, make it in itself an evil. It is good if used lawfully and rightly. It becomes an evil when it turns people into fools. It is an evil if it leads people to think that they are free to violate God's holy laws; to take plenty of wines; to be unfaithful to husbands; to break the Sabbath; become drunkards; to lie, to steal, to be deceitful and disorderly, to dream of living easily without working for a living. On the other hand, if freedom is accompanied with personal integrity; if uprightness goes hand in hand with it; if it leads to true self-respect; if good sense and civility attend it; if prudent forethought for a coming raising day leads to diligence and steady industry, and every year finds you rising in intelligence and improving in condition, why, then you are escaping the evils, you are gaining the true good of freedom.

3. Now I want to say, I want you to understand and believe, that Religion is the root out of which all these things, these virtues of character, this integrity, self-restraint, prudent foresight, industry, civility, all grow. The difficulty with most people is not that they don't see and think well of what is right, but that they do not act up to their sense of duty. What is wanting is not so much light as power. It gratifies the appetites to do wrong; it costs self-denial to do right. And now what is to make a man "deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world?" It must be power from another world. It must be God's grace, in Jesus Christ. Genuine religion makes us partakers of this power and grace. Then there is, so to speak, a new mainspring put into the stand-still machinery of man's heart. Then the watch goes. Then the steam-engine moves and the boat goes up stream. Now this power is, necessarily, inside of a man, not outside. Putting on Sunday clothes, going to church, hearing the Word, taking the sacrament, looking serious and solemn—these are all outside things

—very good, very proper, if we have the inside power; good for little or nothing without that. It is inside power alone that grows and increases. You might tie a hundred green branches to a dead tree, and neither it nor they would grow. What the tree needs is life-power at the heart, working outwards in the bud, branch, blossom, and ripe fruit at last.

To get hold of this spiritual life-power, what have we to do? We have to repent of all past sins, and turn away from them, asking God to help us by His Holy Spirit. We have to believe the Gospel—to believe in Christ—to accept and hold Him as an all-sufficient Saviour, asking God to help us by His Holy Spirit. Then God, mercifully, for the sake of Christ, pardons us; then He renews us inwardly, in the spirit of the mind; then we receive the spirit of adoption whereby we cry, "Abba, Father!" The love of God is shed abroad in the heart. Then we have the power. The devil tempts us, but then we can resist. The flesh allures us; but we can resist. The chance to make a dishonest bargain comes along; the opportunity to dodge an honest engagement comes along; without the inward life-power, we are gone! With it, we go through the fire and through the water, and conquer ourselves, sin and the devil! We are able to keep ourselves pure, no matter who around us may be defiled. This sort of religion, the inward life-power religion, makes us diligent in business while we are fervent in spirit, serving the Lord alike in both. Thus it is the spring of all improvement. In one hand it holds the promise of the life which now is; in the other, the promise of that which is to come.

Hold fast to your religion, then. Hold fast to Christ. He shed his blood to ransom you. Hold fast the profession of your faith without wavering. Your ministers implore in your behalf the blessing and influence of Him who can establish, strengthen, and settle you. Let no false doctrine, no lying fable, no spot of defilement, no wrinkle of religious decay, be found among you. Attend the worship of God punctually and conform to the requirements of the discipline of the church.

Send your children to the Sunday-school. They will there be taught to read God's holy word—taught the fear of the Lord. Opportunities of instruction and improvement are now open to your children, which many of you did not enjoy. As far as you can do so, I advise you to send your children to the day-schools also; and encourage them to improve their minds. This improvement will qualify them to meet the responsibilities and perform the duties of the station in life in which it has pleased the providence of God to place them. It will teach them true self-respect. They will be modest, orderly and well behaved in proportion as they become intelligent, and are acquainted with the true value of industry, frugality and order, provided they are brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

The General Conference, at its last session, made provision that wherever the colored members of the M. E. Church South, prefer it, and their numbers justify it, they may be organized into separate pastoral charges, each having its own Quarterly Conference, composed of official members, as provided for in the Discipline. These Quarterly Conferences may recommend to the Annual Conference, after suitable examination into gifts, grace and usefulness, persons whom they may deem suitable for Deacons' and Elders' Orders. In time, when these pastoral charges become large and numerous enough to be formed into Presiding Elders' Districts, the law of the church allows it to be done, if in the judgment of the Bishop having jurisdiction the religious interests of the colored people require it. And whenever the state of the work shall make it necessary, Annual Conferences of colored preachers may be organized.

Thus, you see, all necessary and judicious measures for your future wants and probable growth have been provided.

Let me beg you, however, to be watchful and careful as to the religious character and qualifications of the men you license to preach and recommend for ordination. They ought to be men of tried and approved moral character; men who understand the great truths of the Gospel, and can teach them to others; men not puffed up with self-conceit, but alive to the solemn responsibilities of the ministerial office. Bible truth alone can save the soul; and all preaching is only a sounding brass and tinkling symbol which does not give instruction in this truth.

And now, let me remind you that we are all strangers and pilgrims on earth; and that our great business here is to prepare for another and better country beyond the grave. Be satisfied with no grade of religion which does not so lead you to walk with God as to have the testimony that you please Him.

By diligence, by watchfulness and prayer, by the devout and conscientious use of the means of grace and the ordinances of the Lord, the Sabbath, the sacraments, the preaching of His Word, keep yourselves in the love of God; looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life. So at last an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly, into His everlasting kingdom.

By order and in behalf of the Conference. W. M. WIGHTMAN.

THE CHINA MISSION.

MR. EDITOR: The recent news from China is highly interesting. The history of Protestant missions in that empire is not peculiar, but substantially what has characterized the introduction of Christianity into all civilized countries. Savages who have no organized society, or established moral or religious opinions, may accept any religious creed with ease; but where the people have a religious system of their own, founded upon the traditional faith of centuries, and where this system is part of civil, social and domestic law, the case is vastly different. To unsettle public confidence in the recognised dogmas of religion or political economy, is a task of no ordinary magnitude, and one of great peril to society. Missionaries are often persecuted as disturbers of the public peace, and as dangerous members of the community; and such they are, where they practice only the "tear down" policy. If Christianity does not instantly become a regulating principle, controlling the lives of converts from heathenism, they are in a worse condition than they were before, at least, so far as society is concerned. The young men of India, educated at William's College, are regarded as the most dangerous element in the native society. The insane policy of the East India Company in its control of public schools, encouraging a knowledge of the physical sciences, which inevitably undermine the absurd cosmogony of Brahmanism, and consequently all its religious authority, while it persistently refused to allow any instruction in Christianity, has resulted in creating a generation of restless educated infidels. These men did much to foment the popular discontent which culminated in the horrible revolt of 1854. The natives of India regard the English, and by a very natural process, impute all foreigners in the same charge, as subverters of all religion; and in Asia, everywhere, this is equivalent to the destruction of all law and order. In this opinion, the Chinese agree with the Hindus. They regarded the effort to establish Christian missions, as a covert assault upon the peace and security of society generally, and resisted it accordingly. In India, the foreigner had dethroned the native princes and made himself master of the land. Why should he not be expected to attempt the same in China? And in fact, has he not done so?

English and French diplomacy at Peking, rule the millions of that vast empire to-day. The Chinese government was not ignorant of the course England has pursued in India, and in other parts of the East, and naturally dreaded even commercial intercourse with her. Nothing but the humiliating misfortunes of the "Opium war" of 1842, could have induced China to open her ports to foreign trade. They were not ignorant of the commercial advantages, which Western traffic would bring, but they wisely feared the insatiable ambition of the English government. This constituted a reason why the Chinese government did all that it safely could, to resist in every form European aggression, and, of course, missionary operations. The first missionaries to China, therefore, had to contend against the powerful opposition of the government.

Added to this formidable obstacle, was the national antipathy to all "outside barbarians," which characterized the people of China. There is among all people, a latent feeling of dislike to foreigners. Even in our eclectic and liberal country, there is an ill-disguised feeling of aversion to the "outlandish" among us. Our national creed, habits, and education, tend to suppress the feelings, but, in China, it amounts to a passion. The nature of his work, requires as a condition of success, that the missionary have the confidence and esteem of the people among whom he labors. This in China is to be gained by long years of toil, and patient waiting. The outrages inflicted upon the people, by the British East India soldiers during the war, had created an intense popular hatred of all who were in any way associated with them. So universal and bitter was this feeling, that no European was safe beyond the vicinity of a foreign community. With this impracticable difficulty the missionaries had to contend.

Another discouraging circumstance attending the first efforts to establish missions in China, was the insalubrity of the climate. For fifteen years the average of missionary life in China was five years. This was barely long enough to initiate them into the methods of labor. Before they were able to do any efficient work, two-thirds of those sent out, were compelled to return, or lie down and die. Those who could remain were enfeebled, and much of their natural energy abated by the emanating effects of the climate.

To these embarrassments must be added the usual difficulties attending the acquisition and use of a heathen language. The first missionaries, of course, found no help to the difficult task before them. All was a wilderness untraveled by Christian feet, and no small amount of blundering impeded their progress. Many temporal cares and labors also demanded attention. But, "time, patience, and perseverance, accomplish all things," and the languages were mastered—tracts and Bibles printed, and a Christian literature of no mean character created.

Great as these difficulties are, I repeat, they can in no sense, worthy the name, be called peculiar. All early missions have their trials, and, in so far as every field differs from every other field, these trials are peculiar, but only thus far. The results which have attended the labors of missionaries in China, are equal to that of any mission field, for the same number of years, in the world. Nor do I make this statement, without a full knowledge of all it implies. Take the time, the number of men employed, and the funds expended; and then cast up the number of converts, tracts and Bibles printed and circulated; and no field of modern enterprise can exhibit a more encouraging report. It is said, "nothing has been done in China." This is not true, and no man who is well informed, will do himself the discredit to repeat such a statement. Much has been done. Much is being done there now. Our mission has done much, and is now in a condition, if sustained as it ought to be, to do much more. But if the miserable policy of "giving up," should be adopted, the ground gained would be lost. Some are zealous for Domestic Missions. That is all right. I observe that those who advocate Domestic Missions, versus Foreign Missions, are not the men to do anything for home. They Domestic Missions, after the fashion of the Northern fanatics' love the negro, because he dislikes master. The spirit of Christian enterprise which cultivates with gentleness, the moral wastes in the domestic field, is the first to carry the Gospel into "the regions beyond." The fountain which rises high enough to fertilize its own vicinity, will send its streams into more distant regions. Activity at home begets the aggressive energy which works efficiently abroad. China ought to begin at home, but poor charity that remains at home!

God is bearing witness to the faithful labors of his servants in China, by pouring out his Spirit upon the people. The letters of brothers Wood and Lambuth, full of gracious encouragement, all the friends of foreign missions have the utmost confidence in the genuineness of the revival which they report as having taken place in the province of Shantung. The principal agent in this, is a native helper of the M. E. Church South. Let us "thank God and take courage."

DISCUSSION OF ONE BLOCK IN YORK.—Here it is: "Fifty-nine small buildings, occupied by families, in which are 812 Irish, Germans, 186 Italians, 189 Polish, 12 French, 9 English, 7 Portuguese, 2 Welsh, 39 negroes, and American. Total, 1520. Of the 113 are Protestants 287 Jews, 1062 Catholics. Of the 613 children but 166 attend any school. 900 adults 605 can neither read nor write. There are 50 degenerate women, but not one of them American. In this block are underground tenements, the most which are from eight to ten below the sidewalk. There are twenty grog shops. One Sabbath a gentleman counted for five hours the number of persons who went into two of them. There were 445 men, 445 women, 32 boys, and girls. Total, 1045."

AN IMPORTANT TRUTH.—The minister who furnishes appropriate employment for the members of his church performs one of the most useful services connected with human agency, and is the least likely to labor in vain, and spend his strength in nought. A conviction of personal responsibility for the prosperity of religion, deeply fixed in the heart of every private Christian—a responsibility which all are but too ready to throw off upon this minister—if anything can, render them compact, "instant in prayer," "always abounding in the work of the Lord." It is one of the best preparations for hearing the word with profit; for with it they will not, not to cavil, but to be assured, but for edification, and that they may learn "what the Lord will do for them."—[Life of Payson.

RENUNCIATION OF ROMANISM.—On recent Sabbath at St. Anne, Ill., a priest publicly renounced the error of the Romish church, in the presence of a vast multitude of people among whom were many Roman Catholics, who came to hear the reasons why he was leaving the Church of Rome. He spoke with such powerful eloquence that several Romanists have been shaken in their faith, and we hope, before long, many will follow him to the feet of Jesus Christ. Two Roman Catholics were admitted to the Church of Christ. Mr. Chiquiquy, the same day, to the Church of Christ.—[Clinton Observer.

$5,000 FOR THE POOR.—The reformed congregation at Hagerstown, Md., was on Christmas day, last, made the recipient of a beautiful Christmas gift. One of its members, on that day, sent in to the Consistory a document creating a fund of $5,000, the interest of which is to be distributed to the poor, accompanying it with a suggestion which contemplated the virtual increase of the fund, by adding to the regular alms of the congregation—a suggestion which was accepted by the Consistory, and confirmed and established by their action.

God never wrought miracles to convince atheism, because his ordinary works convince it.

It is one thing to be concerned for the things of this life, and another to be entangled thereby.

THE CRETAN INSURRECTION.

BY A RESIDENT OF CRETE.

The Assembly was a long time completing its labors. The roads were watched in Crete, and the people poor, and unable long to stay away from their homes; so that it was weeks ere a full interchange of opinion was effected. They were determined that the Pasha should not trick them this time, or make it appear that they were only a minority of the Cretans. Every village should be represented by properly chosen deputies, and they should all come to Bouzoumaria, and actually take part. The Pasha threatened and stormed, but they persisted. Patrols were set on every road by which troops could come, but the Cretans replied to the Pasha that they had assembled without arms, according to their right, to petition their sovereign, and that they would remain until their object was accomplished. The deputies from Candia and Sitia were long in coming, and a dozen of the members went to hurry them up. They were armed only with clubs; but, declaring that they carried arms, the Pasha sent orders to arrest them. A party of a dozen Zaptirs were sent out to intercept them as they passed Retimo. These met the Cretans on the way, and the commander of the detachment ordered them to surrender. One of the Cretans, by way of reply, sprang upon the nearest Zaptir, wrenched away his gun, and, presenting it, told them to leave instantly. Awed or frightened, they turned and left the Cretans to go their way.

The Assembly was finally complete; all the deputies signed the petition at the place of meeting, and it was dispatched, one copy being given to the Pasha, one sent to Constantinople, and others sent to all the consuls. The Pasha replied to the letter of the Assembly that he would forward the petition and support it, but that, now that it was made, the Assembly must disperse, or he would send an armed force to break it up.

The Assembly appointed a committee of about thirty men to wait the reply to the petition, and the rest went home. The Pasha then sent out some of his partisans to obtain signatures to a counter-petition, declaring that the Cretans were content with Ismail, and that the Assembly did not represent the people. This was the move the Cretans had anticipated; and they met it by sending a party of their adherents, who caught the Janissaries in their own village, and, with the full approbation of their fellow-townsmen, obliged them to destroy the circular of the Pasha, and sign letters to him, declaring that the Cretans were united against him. The force was not repeated.

The governor then sent a deputation, consisting of the Bishop of Khania, several members of the Council, and influential Greeks, to order the committee to disperse entirely, declaring that so long as there remained the least gathering, he would regard the Assembly as still remaining. At the same time he invited a conference of the consuls, and sent out messengers to the country Mussulmen to come into the capital town.

The committee next day sent to him a reply by the hands of a dozen of their number, saying that they had been deputed by the mass of the Cretan people to petition the Sultan, and that they were ordered to wait the reply; that they dared not return to their villages until the object of meeting had been accomplished; but they would come to Khania, and remain under guard, or be guarded by a body of Turkish troops at Bouzoumaria, where they were. At all events, they could not and would not disperse. The real reasons of their persistence were two: 1st, they apprehended that the Pasha would repeat his old policy; and 2d, they feared that once they dispersed he could quietly arrest them one by one.

The conference of the consuls was held; and, as in it were developed the immediate causes of the present state of the island, we shall be as particular in our account of it as information given us by a participant, enables us to be.

Ismail had always been in the habit of bullying the consuls. His available practice, on the arrival of a new consul, was to make a quarrel with him, and try the stiffness of his back. The cause was generally some breach of consular privilege; and at this time he had just passed through one controversy with the American consul, in which he had been obliged to give way, and was involved in others with the English, French, and Italian, besides being in standing bad terms with the Austrian and Dutch. His calling the consuls into conference then did not indicate that he wanted their advice; but that he wanted to make use of them for his own plans. He wished to strike a masterly blow at

Crete, insubordination, and he wanted to make the consuls approve of it in advance.

He opened the conference by a resume of his measure towards this rebellious Assembly, in which he claimed great credit for moderation, but declared that now, all persuasive measures having been exhausted, he must resort to force. In short, he should on the next day send an armed force to arrest or disperse the committee.

The majority of the consuls politely gave the governor all the credit he claimed for moderation. Some expressed a hope that he would continue to show that virtue; and all agreed that, if the recusants should, after the application of all pacific inducements, refuse to yield, the governor would be justified in sending troops after them. So far it seemed that Ismail was about to succeed in getting the acquiescence of the consular wisdom in his intended first blow, after which the rest would necessarily follow. The conference was about to adjourn when the Italian consul stated that he had information which persuaded him that, if the committee were assured that they would not be persecuted or arrested for having made the petition, they would readily disperse.

This was confirmed by the Hellenic and Russian consuls, who had received similar information; and the Italian representative urged, with some warmth, the granting of this concession, declaring (in which he was followed by all present) that up to that day the Assembly and its committee could be charged with no illegal or injudicious act, and that, as they had committed no offence, a promise of no punishment was almost superfluous, but, if it would quiet the fears of the committee, it should be made. The Pasha made no reply to the suggestion, but, apparently wishing to avoid the subject, was about to dismiss the conference, when the American consul rose, and begged, since they had been called together to express their opinions, to be allowed, before they separated, to declare his. Since it appeared, he said, that all the committee wanted, to induce them to disperse, was a promise that they should not be molested for having drawn up and sent the petition, acts which even the governor considered to be legal—the (the consul) would not admit that the authorities had exhausted moral means, or were yet entitled to use force. He therefore protested against his implied consent to the intended violence, and made the governor responsible for whatever bloodshed might ensue.

The Italian, Russian, Hellenic, and Dutch consuls supported this declaration more or less energetically, and the discussion was reopened. Ismail was perplexed. What to do he did not see clearly, reluctant as he was to give the promise demanded. His plan for securing consular complicity had fallen through, and his determination seemed to be failing him. It was the opinion of most, if not all present, that, if the consuls had been all united in urging the concession, he would have yielded the point; but, at this juncture, the French consul came to his rescue, and declared that his Excellency not only could not be required to make such a promise, but ought not to make it, as it might anticipate and prejudice the intentions of the Porte. The American consul replied that there was no question of what the Porte thought fit to do; the people had confidence in the Sultan, but they required an assurance from the Pasha that he would not, on his own part, persecute them.

But the governor had taken the hint, and, declaring that the promise required would compromise him with his government, declined to make it. The English consul came to his support, and gave it as his opinion that no such promise could be asked of his Excellency, as it was already implied in his having agreed to support the petition, the last head of which was a prayer for an amnesty to all concerned. Moreover, he said it could not be supposed that the people had any right to expect such a deliberate bad faith from the governor as would be involved in his arresting people who had been guilty of no offence. This supplied the Pasha with a new hint, and he stood on his dignity. Reassured by the support of the two consuls, he took a defiant attitude, and refused any further concession. The conference broke up in some excitement. If the consuls had been unanimous, there is little doubt that the Pasha would have given the promise asked, and all agitation would have ended in Crete for that season. At all events, the unfortunate want of accord of the French and English consuls with their colleagues was the point of departure for the insurrection of 1866.

Not, be it said in passing, that an insurrection in Crete could have been avoided long, the policy of the Porte remaining the same. But it might have been postponed until the events ripening in the East should have settled at once and forever the antagonism of Moslem and Christian in those countries where the Christian is the rightful inheritor. It is certain that, nothing being changed, and Ismail Pasha remaining governor of Crete, the insurrection would have broken out in 1867; but, in that interval, many things might have changed, and any necessity for an outbreak might have been obviated.

The three months that intervened between the sending of the petition to the Sultan and the receipt of the reply were passed in an alteration of menaces by Ismail against the committee, and the sending of protests and appeals to the consuls from the committee. These documents called the Christian powers to mediate between the Sultan and his subjects of Crete, and obtain justice for the latter.

The committee retired to Prosero at the threshold of Sphakia. Troops began to arrive, and a fleet, 6,000 Egyptians being amongst them, under the command of Schallim Pasha, Generalissimo of the army of the Viceroy, a man every way the opposite of Ismail—generous, frank (or an Oriental), politic, and conciliatory. There is no doubt that the object of his coming was to prepare the way for a transfer of Crete once more from the Sultan to the Egyptian Viceroy, and that the scheme had been arranged between the French, Turkish and Egyptian governments, and was to be conducted on the famous modern principle of the plebiscite. Now Ismail, it was said, had a private ambition to be made prince of Crete himself, after it had been erected into a principality similar to Samos. Such an ambition did not consist with the Egyptian plan, and the antagonism of interests led to curious complications.

A negative and menacing reply finally arrived from the Porte, and the two Pashas went into the Apokowia to communicate it, and with the sub-intention on the part of Schallim to promote, by means of the magnificent promises he was deputed by the Viceroy to make, aided by the artfully severe reply of the Turkish government, the plan for the cession of Crete to Egypt. The Cretans, however, replied by the rejection of the authority of the Porte, and an appeal to arms. War served the purpose of Ismail, and he therefore did all in his power to prevent the success of the plans of Schallim. Ismail was, however, struck down by fever, and then Schallim made his rendezvous without opposition, and kept it without interference. Ismail, however, sent a battalion of troops to catch the committee as they came to the rendezvous; and this being found out through the capture of a courier by the Cretan patrol, all negotiations were broken off. After waiting in vain for several days to effect an arrangement, Schallim returned to Khania, whither the governor, seriously ill, had preceded him.

Ismail had, however, contrived to get four battalions of Egyptian troops ordered to Vryses, in the heart of the Apokowia, to replace a small body of the Turkish troops sent there some time before on the pretext of keeping order. Schallim enjoined a conciliatory policy, and kept his troops under the strictest discipline possible. Ismail had also the strictest orders to keep his troops from commencing hostilities; but the Cretan Mussulmen gathered idly around, and in the fortresses furnished the means of breaking the peace. A collision was provoked at Selinos, in the hope of inducing the Christians to attack that place; but they contented themselves with repelling the attack. The coolness which had been growing between the rival chiefs ripened into open rupture on the refusal of Schallim to send a battalion to Selinos to punish the Christians. In the meantime the Egyptian pursued his negotiations with increasing chances of success, and Ismail as steadily moved the disorderly elements at his command to hostility.

Slight collisions took place in various places, and the excitement of the Christians, now armed to the number of about 15,000, rose to fighting heat. They invariably had the best of it with the Cretan Mussulmen. The presence of the Egyptian detachment at Vryses annoyed them. If supported, it was dangerous; if not, it tempted them to an attack and easy victory. Schallim Pasha proposed to withdraw them; but Ismail protested, insisting on their remaining until the arrival of the Commissioner, who was daily expected. Finally, a body of Cretans took possession of the wells from which the Egyptian troops drew their supply of water, in the hope of driving them away. The Egyptians could not, with honor, be driven away by a force of insurgents, however superior in number. They attempted by force to get possession of the wells. A conflict ensued in which the Egyptians suffered an utter defeat. Being blockaded, they were finally obliged to beg for terms, and were permitted to march out undisturbed.

So began an insurrection which, for desperate fighting, endurance, and unanimity on one side, and barbarity and cruelty on the other, is without any parallel in the history of Christian Turkey. Its story cannot now be written; its lesson preceded it. If the representatives of England and France had shown half the sympathy for the Cretan people which the consul of Russia did, they could not only have exercised a controlling influence on the local government, but could have gained a power over the people themselves which would have left little danger of Russian or any other intrigues. He is no better than an idiot who, knowing the Ottoman rule, imagines that any foreign intrigues is necessary to produce an insurrection in the empire. The fuel is always ready for any chance spark elicited by mutual acts of oppression. Is Britain to be deaf to the cry of the Christian races, and always to maintain the Moslem, while in Russia the Eastern Christians find sympathy, if even interested, and promises, if even false?

My Mother.

Some gentlemen passing through the beautiful village of Renton, in the Vale of Leven, Dumbartonshire, about nine o'clock at night, some time ago, had their attention directed to a dark object in the churchyard. On going in to ascertain what it was, they found a boy of tender years lying flat on his face, and apparently sound asleep, over a recently made grave. Thinking this not a very safe bed for him, they shook him up, and asked him how he came there. He said he was afraid to go home, as his sister, with whom he resided, had threatened to beat him. "And where does your sister live?" asked one of the party. "In Dumbarton—nearly four miles off! and how came you to wander so far away from home?" "I just came," sobbed the poor little fellow, "because my mother's grave was here." His mother had been buried there a short time before, and his seeking a refuge at her grave in his sorrow, was a beautiful touch of nature, in a child who could scarcely have yet learned to realize the true character of that separation which knows of no reunion on earth. Thither he had instinctively wandered to sob out his sorrows, and to moisten with tears the grave of one who had hitherto been his natural protector, for he had evidently cried himself asleep. —North British Mail.

ANOTHER FEMININE PHENOMENON. There is a Miss Windsor in Providence, R. I., whose case is similar in many respects to the curious one in Brooklyn, lately made public, and the following singular statement is well authenticated: Miss Windsor has been confined to her bed for several months, and has not partaken of sufficient nourishment to keep her alive, if she had been in a normal condition. Yet her faculties have become strangely acute, and she seems to be endowed with a species of second sight. When the physician, Dr. Ira Barrow, calls on her, she can tell the number of visits he has made, the number of the houses of his patients, and describes accurately their complaints. The clock having been removed from her chamber, she was enabled to determine at any hour the exact time of day or night, and she would describe the color size and marks of the doctor's horse, and the hue and texture of the linings of his carriage. She composed a poem which she called "The Sea Serpent," one-half of each line in Latin and the rest in English, which was pronounced by the professors of Brown's university pure Latin, although she had never had the least instruction in the language. She also draws finely, without having taken lessons, and does other extraordinary things not to be accounted for by any of the known laws of temperament, medicine or science. While asleep her right arm is constantly in motion, though she is awake. A number of the physicians and savans of Providence are deeply interested in the case of Miss Windsor, and are endeavoring to solve the mystery of her seemingly supernatural powers.

The course of true love does not run smooth. Cleaning Louts ought hardly to be expected of brides nowadays; but it seems to have been in England, judging from the following:

In a church near Wakefield the wedding ceremony of a minor received an untimely interruption when the question was put, "Wilt thou have this woman to be thy wedded wife?" The man turned round to the woman, and asked her, "Wilt thou clean my boots?" The bride vocalized no answer to the interrogation, although repeated three times, each time with greater emphasis and force, before the clergyman recovered from his surprise, and ordered the "fretful pair" out of the edifice. This greatly disconcerted the benedict. On his repentance and entreaty the clergyman was induced to return and complete the marriage ceremony.

FARM AND GARDEN.

WHAT IS PROGRESSIVE AGRICULTURE? The New York Observer answers this question in a few words, but very comprehensively, as follows: "Under its influence spring-tidy and convenient dwellings, adorned with shrubs and flowers, and beautiful within with the smiles of happy wives, tidy children in the lap of thoughtful age—broad hearts and acts, as well as words of welcome. Progressive agriculture builds barns and puts gutters on them, builds stables for cattle and raises roots to feed them. It grafts wild apple trees by the meadow with pippins or greenings; it sets out new orchards and takes care of the old ones. It drains low lands, cuts down bushes, buys a mower, house tools and wagons, keeps good fences and practices soilings. It makes hens lay, chickens live, and prevents swine from rooting up meadows. Progressive agriculture keeps on hand plenty of dry fuel and brings in the oven wood for the women. It plows deeply, sows plentifully, harrows evenly, and prays for the blessings of Heaven."

HOW TO DETERMINE WHERE WATER IS.—At a recent meeting of the American Institute, Farmers Club, a member stated as follows:

"An Irishman in his employment in order to ascertain where he ought to dig to obtain water soonest got a stone and buried it over night in the ground, next to the hard pan. In the morning he found it quite moist, but not sufficiently to suit his fancy. Next night he tried it in another spot, and it was found very wet on the following morning. "There," said Patrick, "you will find water not many feet deep and plenty of it." Sure enough in a few days' digging, Patrick confirmed his prediction, notwithstanding the jeers of the workmen—finding a vein which filled the well to overflowing, and rendered it exceedingly difficult to bail out the water so as to stone it. The philosophy of the operation seems to be that as great evaporation takes place from the surface of the earth during the water raises up from the depths below to supply the loss, and accumulates in the vicinity of the stone, often making quite a puddle.

A WORD FOR MULES.—The American Agriculturist puts in "a word for mules," as follows: We are glad to see that the use of mules for all kinds of hard, rough work, is steadily gaining ground. These animals are not beautiful or musical, but they are useful and economical. They are fit to work younger than the horses, since they are put to service at three years old, though they do not reach their maturity until seven years of age. Their temper, health and usefulness depend very much on the manner of breaking them. The so-called stubbornness and obstinacy of this animal arises chiefly from the abuse he is wont to receive when young. He seldom, if ever, bites or kicks those who treat him kindly. But the fact is, that the club and whip, and whiplash and boot-toe, are applied to him without mercy; and yet he is expected to be always as patient and gentle as a cow.

The mule will do more work and require less grain than a horse; he is less liable to disease and recovers from sickness and injury quickly than a horse. He works better when old and holds out longer. He seldom takes fright or runs away. He does not like overworking when driving heavy loads, and he should never be driven very fast. In making up spans (those of 15 to 15½ hands high make the most serviceable teams), those of similar dispositions should be chosen and put together, so that they will work together pleasantly and with a will. The mule seems made for work; he thrives under it, and is better in spirits and temper than when idle.

FARMERS.—Educate your sons to live in the country and become farmers—intelligent, skillful farmers, able to till the earth and to keep it. It is a striking fact in the history of nations, and especially of the free, that the men who have controlled the destinies of empires, have generally been born and raised in the country, beyond the temptations and corrupting tendencies of large cities, in which there is a constant tendency to human degeneracy, arrested only by an incessant and ever fresh infusion of population from the country, the never failing source from which they must be replenished.

Does the Woman Move?—The following notice recently appeared in a Roman Catholic paper, N. Y.: "With the approbation of our bishop, Right Rev. J. B. Mitge, we have founded a mass to be said every day for one hundred years, from the 21st of March, 1766, to the 21st of March, 1866, in favor of all those who pay one hundred dollars towards the erection of our new church in honor of St. Benedict. The names of all the subscribers will be engraved on either side of the altar."

HOUSEKEEPERS DEPARTMENT.

We were greatly surprised to discover, during a recent trip to the country, that our receipts for Housekeepers were being severely criticized by the Ladies. A "vegetable soup" consisting of two potatoes, two turnips, two carrots, two parsnips, two onions, etc., without any meat, was quoted as a very queer, unsatisfactory, and absurd potage. We have never actually tried this soup, neither the parties who commented upon it; but we give it as an opinion that two of every kind of vegetables will make a pretty considerable contribution towards a real vegetable soup. It was a flying receipt which, we republished for young housekeepers, and all who are and supposed to have plenty of time, and some inclination to make experiments in the kitchen. We have known of some of these flying receipts giving great satisfaction. However, we shall hereafter occasionally publish some original, tried receipts which have been kindly sent to the Advocate by lady friends. We hope to have more of them from some of the ladies of Louisiana, of Mississippi, and Alabama, who are as famous for good cooking, and elegant hospitality, as they are for the higher Christian virtues. These tried receipts will be set up in more open type than those flying receipts, and so can be easily recognized.

TOTTER SOAP-BUBBLES.—Our young folks may go to their parents and find out about these bubbles. An exchange says:

"Those who have experimented with ephemeral retracing spheres blown from common soap and water, will be glad to know that bubbles of extraordinary size and strength can be formed from a mixture of oleate of soda and glycerine. They may be kept on glass or under bell jars for 24 hours. When dropped upon the floor they rebound like a ball. If carefully cut open with a pair of scissors, wet with the solution, smaller spheres may be blown inside. Under the microscope the movements and iridescence of a small bubble present many beautiful changes."

SCALLOPED OYSTERS.—Wash out of the liquor two quarts of oysters, pound very fine eight soft crackers, or grate a stale loaf of bread; butter a deep dish, sprinkle in a layer of crumbs, then a layer of oysters, a little mace pepper, and bits of butter; another layer of crumbs, another of oysters, then seasoning as before, and so until the dish is filled; cover the dish over with bread crumbs, seasoning as before; turn over it a cup of the oyster liquor. Set it into the oven for thirty or forty minutes to brown. This is an excellent way to prepare oysters for a family dinner. —Rural New Yorker.

CRANBERRY ROLL.—Stew a quart of cranberries in just water enough to keep them from burning; make it very sweet, strain it through a colander, and set it away to cool; when quite cold, make a paste as for apple pudding; spread the cranberries about an inch thick; roll it up in a floured cloth, and tie it close at the ends; boil it two hours, and serve it with sweet sauce. Stewed apples or any other kind of fruit may be made in the same way.

SORGHUM VINEGAR.—"J. S. C." writes: We have never succeeded in making vinegar from Sorghum juice without boiling; but if it be boiled away one-third or one-half, it will make good vinegar. We have made Sorghum vinegar for a number of years, and we make the best from the white skimmings and washings of the finishing pan. As soon as the juice begins to thicken up in boiling, or when it gets to be very thin syrup, a whitish scum rises, which, if saved and diluted with rain-water, will make a number one vinegar. Vinegar can be made from good Sorghum syrup, (one gallon of syrup to two of rain-water,) but it will not work as quick, and is no better than that made from the skimmings. The reason of this, I suppose, is that the skimmings contain something that acts as a ferment. Keep the skimmings until the following spring, add about as much water as you have skimmings; be sure and leave it sweet enough for the sweeter it is the better the vinegar will be; then, if it is too sweet to work well, add more water; put it in a vinegar or whiskey cask, and set in a sunny place to work. —American Advocate.

TO ADVERTISERS.

This paper has for many years been well known in this community as the very best advertising medium by which the business men of the city could bring their merchandise, trades, professions, and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood when it is remembered that the four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States in the Rio Grand, East Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all, more or less active agents for the paper; and when it is also remembered that our paper circulates among a large class of people who seldom see any other New Orleans paper.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order. We have reason to believe that of all the monies forwarded to us by mail but a very small amount has failed to reach us; whenever the letters have been registered.

GARDEN SEEDS.

We have received from Messrs. David Landreth & sons, two packages of garden seeds. These gentlemen raise their own seed, and warrant them "fresh and genuine." They are for sale by most druggists, and seed-stores, and country merchants. This firm, also furnishes seeds of the various grasses, as Orchard, Herd, Kentucky Blue, Mixed Lawn, Timothy, Lucerne, Millet, Saint Foin, etc., address, DAVID LANDRETH & SONS, No. 23 South Sixth street, Philadelphia. The next time they send a package of seed, please do not put in so many radishes, but more melon, and some pea seeds.

PASTORAL ADDRESS.

We publish this week this able address of Bishop Wightman. Preachers in the Mobile Conference, who have charge of colored congregations, should read it to them. It addresses the colored man in the style and tone of one who has toiled for his salvation, and has always known him.

DEATH OF BISHOP SOULE.

This sad event is announced by a telegram from Bishop McTear. Bishop Soule died on the morning of the 6th inst., in the city of Nashville. Our last news from the Bishop was to the effect that he was in improved health, and we had hoped that he would be spared for sometime longer. The death of our Senior Bishop will be received by our church with profound regret and sorrow. If we mistake not, he was the oldest Methodist Preacher in the world, with one exception. His long life of responsibility and usefulness is without stain. His was a character of grand proportions, without infirmities, and with few if any errors. In history it will rise clearly and sharply in its outlines, and proportions, with princely eminence. He was for sixty-eight years a preacher, and forty-three years a Bishop. He was born in the State of Maine, in 1781, entered the ministry in 1799, ordained Deacon in 1801, Elder in 1803, and made a Bishop in 1824. Bishop Soule was in his 86th year, at the time of his death. With American Methodism he has been identified for this long period, during the entire growth and development of the church from the beginning. In the division of the church, in 1844, the Bishop firmly adhered to the South, and his counsels and influence have been a tower of strength to our Southern Church. His labors have extended over every part of the continent, and his name is familiar as "household words" throughout the bounds of our country. A more extended notice of Bishop Soule's character, life and labors, will appear hereafter.

EXPATRIATION.

In another column will be found a letter addressed to Dr. Foster, on the subject of Belize and British Honduras. This gentleman is an old and well known citizen of Louisiana, and a member of our church. He is now on his way to Belize, to examine the country, and to secure homes for himself and several other families of our best people. He has promised to furnish us with communications from time to time, and through him, we hope to furnish our readers with all they may wish to know in reference to that country.

We are not prepared as yet to advocate or advise voluntary expatriation. This country was once known as the asylum for the oppressed of all nations. It was for the most part originally colonized by those who fled from tyranny, and sought the boon of civil and religious liberty. For a hundred years, our shores have invited and received the political refugees, exiles, and emigrants from the oppressed nations of the old world. Now, however, the tables are turned. We witness to-day the strange spectacle, and record the startling fact, of thousands of native born Americans seeking refuge in other lands: from the iron despotism which has despoiled them of the last remnant of civil liberty. The government that has so long welcomed and nourished the alien and stranger, now casts out its own children.

In all history, we do not know a more striking, saddening, and suggestive fact than this. It was once thought and believed, that Americans were bound to be free, and that Anglo-Saxon blood would congeal sooner than flow in the veins of a subjugated people. It certainly was not expected that men of this race, however great their power and opportunities, could consent to heap gratuitous and needless humiliation upon States whose past history entitled them to magnanimous and respectful treatment. Times change, and men change with them. Our old notions of freedom and the inalienable rights, about which the fathers of the Republic wrote, must be viewed as mere abstractions.

An attempt to assert and secure those inalienable rights has ended in the loss of all. The military bill leaves not a shadow. The government of the South is now military, and the lives and fortunes of our people, are in the hands of military officers and tribunals. What pretence of civil government we have, is by mere sufferance. The trial by jury, the Habeas Corpus, and representation are gone.

It is not strange that many should be anxiously looking for homes where they may escape the evils which threaten them here. And the less so when there are ominous indications of wholesale confiscation, and the impeachment of the President. It is hard to bear the loss of liberty, and the harder as the prospect of its restoration, at any time within the generation to come is exceedingly dim. Besides our liberties, it is the nature conviction of many, that we have lost the elements of material prosperity. Capital and labor will be slow to enter a country where martial law is the established and permanent order. The sudden emancipation of the slaves, and the impoverishment of the whites, together with the deep humiliation of political oppression, has led to social demoralization. There is no disposition to resist the Federal authority. This is a settled question everywhere. But there is vagrancy, idleness, and robbing, and thieving amongst the freedmen. So much of it in some sections, that the industrious farmer or planter, is measurably stripped of the hard earned fruits of his toil. There are also white men, made reckless by the loss of liberty and property, and others, always without character or responsibility, who are banded together as depredators upon those who are struggling to live by honest industry. The gentleman to whom we alluded in the beginning of this article, leaves one of the most beautiful and fertile sections of our State, with the conviction that the growing social demoralization, will soon make it utterly untenable. Such is the opinion of gentlemen from other parts of the South, whose views we are compelled to respect.

Here then are the reasons which move many to leave their homes and firesides, endeared to them by many ties and associations, to try their fortunes in foreign lands. But it is difficult to decide upon the place. What country, congenial in climate and soil, offers a refuge from the evils we would avoid? Mexico, is not that place at the present time—it is the frying pan, and the fire over again. Brazil, we distrust. There is little in the religion, language, and civilization of that country, that is congenial or inviting. Whatever may be the advantage and privileges accorded to the colonists there, can there be any guarantee that these will be permanent? For a time all may go on harmoniously and prosperously, but in the end there must be trouble. The natives will look upon the new comers with jealousy. The conflict of religion, and the antipathies of diverse customs and dissimilar civilizations will not long slumber. Assimilation will not be possible, and the weaker party goes to the wall. British Honduras, is probably preferable. There is a climate of unbroken summer, a fertile soil, nearly spontaneous in all tropical products, and there is a government, the freest in the world, and powerful enough to protect its subjects.

But we doubt the policy of expatriation for the present. We shall nowhere find a country equal to the one we leave, in the rich endowments of nature. We are now in a state of transition, and by remaining where we are, we may contribute to the readjustment of society, and the material prosperity of the country. We must "learn to labor and to wait." The madness which rules the hour cannot last. Our children, at least may do better here than elsewhere. We advise patience, and the quiet, earnest pursuit of all peaceable avocations. To be passive in political affairs, and to make the best fight we can with the difficulties that embarrass our industry, is the course which circumstances indicate. To such as feel that they must go, we bid God speed, but we hope that few will take this step, until the wisdom of it shall be more clearly demonstrated.

We have drawn as dark a picture as facts will warrant, and with this before us, we believe the time has not yet come. Bad as things are, they are not worse than we expected, when the South made her final surrender. We shuddered then, and once, and have since cultivated resignation to all the consequences involved. As a people, we are reduced to great straits, but we may be made perfect through suffering. The path to victory is not through blood, but by a patient submission and endurance which may triumph in the end. The great mass of our people must remain, and all that leave the country, in some degree, make their condition worse. To be united in suffering is a true heroism. The man who is first to leave an endangered ship is not the most courageous. We will not question the motives and conduct of our friends, who have made up their minds to exile, for we know them to be true and good men, but we feel that we ought not give up all as lost. We hope for a brighter day.

MAJOR T. R. HEARD.

This well known and much esteemed citizen of New Orleans died in Woodville, Miss., on the morning of the 3rd instant. Major Heard served with distinction throughout the late war, and was universally respected for all the qualities of a good citizen. He was a man of the kindest feelings, unselfish, benevolent, and amiable, in short a Christian gentleman. He was a man of prayer, humble in his walk with God—and perhaps too sensitive and shrinking in his religious profession and deportment. His death was calm and peaceful. He expressed himself as trustful in Christ, as the ground of his hope, and sweetly fell asleep in Jesus. Our departed friend leaves a devoted and accomplished wife, to mourn his loss. But there is hope in this sorrow, and we are sure that our bereaved sister will find comfort and support in the Savior whose presence sustained her husband in the final hour. It is at such times, that we most fully appreciate the life and immortality which has been brought to light through the Gospel.

BELIZE HONDURAS.

The attention of our readers is called to the communications on this subject. We have other articles on the same, which will appear hereafter. Dr. Foster and other reliable gentlemen—planters and business men leave to-day for Belize, and will furnish us with the results of their observations, and conclusions about the country. Persons seeking information of this kind, will find it to their advantage to subscribe for the Advocate. We are not yet of the mind to emigrate ourselves, as our remonstrance in another place will show, but we should not be surprised if we become a convert, by the time our friends have completed their explorations.

BELIZE HONDURAS.

DR. D. W. FOSTER—Dear Sir, As the Senior Partner, and fully authorized to act in behalf of my firm, Putnam Vop Ohlaffen & Co., owners of Ambergris Island, British Honduras, I submit to you the following proposition, which will be binding upon my firm and partners in the event of account to me. You, or any of your friends whom you think will make good neighbors, can move upon the said Island of Ambergris, and occupy as much good arable land as each of you may require, to cultivate and for other active, and actual farming purposes, for the full term of five years free of any charge whatever, either in the shape of rent, or in any name or manner whatever.

Should you, or they, upon a thorough examination of the country, conclude that you will do better to buy the land you may be occupying on the Island, you shall have the privilege of buying it at one dollar per acre ($1 per acre) with any reasonable terms of payment to bring it within your, or their means.

Respectfully Yours,

JAMES M. PUTNAM, for self.
PUTNAM, VOP OHLAFEN & CO., of British Honduras.

THE MILITARY BILL.

We publish this in another column. It has become a law; and we notice that measures are being taken to carry its provisions into immediate effect. In this connection read our Governor's proclamation. We are then under martial law. Let us be quiet and attend to our own business, raise corn, and be prayerful. If we have no citizenship on earth, let us comfort ourselves with the hope that our conversation is in heaven.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Mr. Editor: It is not necessary for me to state the reason we don't send you more names for the Advocate, when you know all this portion of Alabama can scarcely live. The cruel war and the failure to make a crop last year, has put the people very low down in all this up country, scarcely able to live. We have a preacher in Ky., now begging for provisions for some of our "itinerants" on the outskirts of the district. We also have a little trouble in parts of our work with the Yankee preachers. The plan is this, they pass through such portions of our work as they ascertain will sanction their notions, hunt up a certain caste of preachers of that "stripe," offer them so much in greenback to join them and form missions, all through our country; as they say,—to get our people back to the "Northern church." You may infer what class of our preachers can be bought with greenbacks, to turn over to the "radicals," and commence to abuse and misrepresent the church of God, which has done so much for them in improving their moral condition in life.

There are many in this country who were not favorable to the division of the church North and South. They will of course, use their influence most assiduously to get others in the same way. In many portions they will give us trouble. But we will fear God and try to do good, pursuing "the even tenor of our way."

Our Quarterly meetings so far, have been encouragingly good, I think, we shall have a good year, I look for a gracious revival all through the country.

May God send it, very soon. Pray for us, that the church may be kept pure—and that the work of God may prosper in our hands.

Yours Very Truly,

T. Moody.

FROM OTHER CHURCHES.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, NORTH. A HOME FOR THE POOR.—The Ladies' Aid Society of the city of Philadelphia, have purchased the property known to the public as the "Creedland—estate," situated on Lehigh avenue, between Rising Sun and Germantown, for the purpose of founding a home for the aged members of the Methodist Church, at a cost of $2700 per acre. There are about six acres, with a good old family mansion on it, which will accommodate about thirty only.

BAPTIST.

The First Louisiana Baptist Association has established in New Orleans a Workmen's Bureau, the object of which is to furnish a supply of field hands, wood choppers, carpenters, brick masons, gardeners, painters, cooks, washwomen, waiters, house servants, seamstresses, school teachers, carriage drivers, blacksmiths, furniture cleaners, and every description of unskilled labor throughout the state. The Bureau will also see to it that when a contract is made, it shall be performed by both parties.

PRESBYTERIAN.

PROSPEROUS.—There has lately been quite a revival in the First Presbyterian Church at Nashville, Tenn., and from various other churches in the South similar reports are made. Presbyterianism in nearly all the Southern States seems in a healthy condition, and as prosperous as could have been expected. Their people are united. The Committee of Publication at Richmond, Va., are actively engaged in furnishing Sunday school books for the denomination, and seem to have considerable success.

FOREIGN.

The Duchess of Leeds and Lady Herbert, of Lea, have, it is said, each given the large sum of £10,000 to the Roman Catholic Church, to be applied to the purchase of Priory Park, near Bath, for the use of that religious body.

BENEVOLENCE OF NATIVE CHURCHES IN ASIA.—The pastors of the native Churches in ancient Armenia, gathered by the missions of the American Board, have formed themselves into an Evangelical Union. At a late meeting of the Union several vital questions were discussed. Among these questions was that of liberal benevolence in supporting all the interests of the Church, including the salary of the pastor. One of the leading members of the Union said, "I am fully persuaded that every Church is not only able to support its poor, but its pastor, too." The question, "Is poverty a reason for a preacher's leaving his office?" was discussed, and to it a unanimous negative was given. The discussions ended in the adoption of the following resolution, by a unanimous vote:

Resolved, That we exhort our Churches to give one-tenth, or more, of all their earnings for the Lord's work—not as bound by the Mosaic law, but from the duty of Christian liberality, and because they, and all they have, are consecrated to God; and when necessary, they are to give all their possessions, and their lives also, for his glory.

ANOTHER REFORM DECREE.—The Emperor Napoleon will soon issue a decree granting the perpetual right of social and religious meetings.

THE HOLY SEPULCHRE.—The Empress Eugenie takes great interest in the holy places at Jerusalem, and French diplomacy, animated by Her Majesty, has succeeded in persuading the Turks to permit the Holy Sepulchre to be repaired, the roof of which has long been in a deplorable condition.

Another Characteristic Scene in the United States Senate.

On the 27th ult., at the evening session of the United States Senate, the following characteristic passage of arms occurred during the consideration of the miscellaneous appropriation bill:

The finance Committee recommended the adoption of an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay such assistants as were actually employed in the collection of internal revenue in the States prior to the 1st day of August, 1866, compensation at the rate prescribed by law.

Mr. Trumbull hoped this would not be adopted. These persons were appointed in direct violation of the law, as they could not take the oath of office.

Mr. Sherman said the circumstances which induced the committee to report this were very simple. The Secretary of the Treasury found it impossible to get men in some of the counties of the rebel State to discharge the duties of assistant assessors who could take the oath. According to law, they must live in the county in which they held their office. The Secretary was compelled to dispense with a portion of the oath in particular cases, and it was now asked to pay these men only up to the 1st of August last.

Mr. Sumner said the Secretary of the Treasury was guilty of an illegal act; nay, more, a crime. He violated law in appointing men who could not take the oath, and when complaint was made, he replied in a notorious falsehood that there were no Unionists in the South who could take the oath. This was nothing less than a notorious untruth. Congress had been too lenient towards the crimes of this officer. He (Mr. Sumner) would not vote to pay these rebels. Let the Secretary pay them out of his own pocket. Mr. Sumner, having in the course of his remarks, referred to Mr. Sherman as attempting to cover up a crime.

Mr. Sherman rose at the conclusion of Mr. Sumner's speech, and said this language was unparliamentary; it was ingenuously said; it was false; it ought not to have been uttered in the Senate. He (Mr. Sherman) had nothing to say in reply to what Mr. Sumner had said about the Secretary of the Treasury. He believed Mr. Sumner had a difficulty of some kind with that officer.

Mr. Sumner rose to interrupt Mr. Sherman, who, however, declined to yield the floor.

Mr. Sherman explained the circumstances attending the appointments referred to. The aggregate amount required for the claim would not exceed $10,000.

Mr. Chandler said he was the author of the original proposition now under discussion. The Committee of Commerce reported a bill of this kind some time ago, because they knew that whatever crime there was in the matter belonged to the Secretary of the Treasury. Congress ought either to impeach the criminal or pay the claim.

Mr. Sumner. Let the Secretary of the Treasury pay it out of his own pocket.

Mr. Chandler. He ain't able. He's a pauper. He can't pay the hundredth part of it.

Mr. Trumbull said there was more involved in this question than a few thousand dollars. It was the principle whether rebels or loyal men should be placed in office in the rebel States. It would not do to say that this was inadvertence on the part of the Secretary, for one of the first things done by the last session of Congress was to call his attention to it.

Mr. Buckalew, in commencing a few remarks in defence of the Secretary of the Treasury, said that Mr. Chandler spoke under the protection given them by the Constitution, that they shall not be held responsible elsewhere for what is spoken in debate. They had no idea of being held responsible to the Secretary for calling him a criminal and pauper. It was not for him (Mr. Buckalew) to question the taste of such references to a high public officer, who cannot defend himself on this floor, and can only be defended in such remarks as other Senators may offer by way of reply to such charges.

Mr. Chandler said he used the word pauper in a comparative sense. He meant to say that he would be a pauper if he was compelled to pay the claims suggested by Mr. Sumner, unless he had stolen more than he thought he had. He (Mr. Chandler) didn't mean to say that the Secretary couldn't buy a loaf of bread. He came here from a little bank out in Indiana, and took clerkship of some kind, which paid him about $3,000. That was twice as much as he was worth. He (Mr. Chandler) wouldn't give him more than $1,000 a year to be a clerk in his bank or in his dry goods store in Detroit. He made a good enough clerk, but when he was asked to the office of Secretary he turned politician, and he was a better politician than a Secretary.

Mr. Sumner—He is a very bad politician.

Mr. Chandler—He is a worse Secretary. He knows literally nothing about politics and less about finance.

Alluding to the remark of Mr. Buckalew, that Senators were not to be held responsible elsewhere for what they said here.

Mr. Chandler said he had no desire to shield himself from responsibility. What he said here he was accountable elsewhere to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to anybody else.

Mr. Lane felt impelled to say a few words in vindication of the Treasury. He had known him for thirty years. Instead of being an unimportant officer of a little bank in Indiana, he was for twenty years President of the State Bank of Indiana, which had thirty branches, and a capital of five millions of dollars. He (Mr. Lane) had nothing to say in defence of the Secretary's action in appointing rebels to office, only to say that the Secretary felt bound to do what he had done, in pursuance of his duty to collect the revenue. These men were appointed on the recommendation of loyal assessors and collectors in the South. He might have made a mistake, but there was a strong claim of equity for the men it was now proposed to pay. They had discharged their duty, and it did not become a great and magnanimous nation to deny a claim of $125 each to a few men who had been appointed on the recommendation of officers of the Government.

Mr. Wilson offered a substitute for the pending proposition, declaring that in employing persons who could not take the oath prescribed by law, as assistant assessors in the rebel States in the collection of internal revenue, the Secretary of the Treasury acted in violation of law, but the persons so employed being guilty of no offense, are entitled to equity to be paid, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay them the amount due them for their services to the 1st of August, 1866.

Mr. Chandler said the fault was with the principals, and not with the assistants. When rebels were appointed as assessors, they appointed rebels as assistants. It was so in the North as well as in the South. In Michigan, when Andrew Johnson appointed copperheads to office, they always selected copperhead assistants. He preferred South Carolina rebels to Michigan copperheads. He could get along with the rebels, but God defend him from the copperheads.

Mr. Fessenden defended the Secretary of the Treasury from what he called the four-monthed attacks made upon him. If any man belonging to what was termed the Radical wing of the Senate had been in the Secretary's position, and had done as the Secretary had done, none of these attacks would have been made upon him. As to the remarks of Mr. Chandler, he would not reply to them, because he could not use language to fully express his opinion on the subject. The allusion to the poverty of the Secretary was a matter of taste, which Mr. Chandler must decide for himself. He would remind the Senator from Allegheny, however, that Alexander Hamilton, the ablest financier the Government ever had, was a poor man, and that men's knowledge of statesmanship or finance was not always in proportion to the depth of their pockets.

Mr. Sumner replied briefly to Mr. Fessenden, again charging the Secretary of the Treasury with criminality in the appointment of these assistant assessors.

After further debate, the Senate, at 11:45, without action, adjourned.

MILITARY BILL.

THE PLAN PROPOSED BY CONGRESS TO GOVERN THE SOUTHERN STATES.

The following is a correct copy of the act "to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States."

Whereas, No legal State governments or adequate protection for life or property now exists in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas and Arkansas; and

Whereas, It is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said States, until loyal and republican State governments can be legally established; therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said rebel States shall be divided into military districts, and made subject to the military authority of the United States as hereinafter prescribed, and for that purpose Virginia shall constitute the first district; North Carolina and South Carolina the second district; Georgia, Alabama and Florida the third district; Mississippi and Arkansas the fourth district, and Louisiana and Texas the fifth district.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the President to assign to the command of each of said districts an officer of the army, not below the rank of brigadier general, and to detail a sufficient military force to enable such officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority within the district to which he is assigned.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of each officer assigned as aforesaid to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace and criminals, and to this end he may allow local civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and to try offenders, or, when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose; and all interference under color of State authority with the exercise of military authority under this act shall be null and void.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all persons put under military arrest by virtue of this act, shall be tried without unnecessary delay and no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted, and no sentence of any military commission or tribunal hereby authorized, affecting life or liberty of any person, shall be executed until it is approved by the officer in command of the district, and the laws and regulations for the government of the army shall not be affected by this act, except in so far as they conflict with its provisions; Provided, That no sentence of death under the provisions of this act shall be carried into effect without the approval of the President.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That when the people of any one of said rebel States shall have formed a constitution of government in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all respects framed by a convention of delegates elected by the male citizens of said State twenty-one years old and upward, of whatever race, color, or previous condition, who have been resident in said State for one year previous to the day of such election except such as may be disfranchised for participation in the rebellion or for felony at common law, and when such constitution shall provide that the elective franchise shall be enjoyed by all such persons as have the qualifications herein stated for election of delegates, and when such constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the persons voting on the question of ratification, who are qualified as electors for delegates, and when such constitution shall have been submitted to Congress for examination and approval, and Congress shall have approved the same, and when said State, by a vote of its legislature elected under said Constitution, shall have adopted the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, and when said article shall have become a part of the Constitution of the United States, said State shall be declared entitled to representation in Congress, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom on their taking the oath prescribed by law, and then and thereafter the preceding sections of this bill shall be inoperative in said State: Provided, That no person exclude from the privilege of holding office by said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States shall be eligible to election as a member of the convention to frame a constitution for any of said rebel States, nor shall any such person vote for members of said convention.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That until the people of said rebel States shall be by law admitted to representation in the Congress of the United States, any civil governments which may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only, and in all respects subject to the paramount authority of the United States, at any time to abolish, modify, control or supersede the same; and in all elections to any office under such provisional government all persons shall be entitled to vote, and none other who are entitled to vote under the provisions of the fifth section of this act, and no person shall be eligible to any office under any such provisional government who would be disqualified from holding office under the provisions of the third article of said Constitutional Amendment.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be eligible to any office under any such provisional government who would be disqualified from holding office under the provisions of the third article of said Constitutional Amendment.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be eligible to any office under any such provisional government who would be disqualified from holding office under the provisions of the third article of said Constitutional Amendment.

room, except the host, who contrived to detain his scientific guest by commencing a conversation with him through the media of pen, ink and paper. They had not interchanged many ideas, before the gentleman, as if by chance, struck the keys of the piano, beside which they were sitting, gradually began to run over one of the great master's own compositions, purposely made numerous errors; and at length blundered so egregiously, that the composer condescended to stretch out his hand, and put him right. That was enough; his fingers were on the instrument; he immediately left him, on some pretext, and joined the company in the next room, who were patiently waiting the issue of the straggle. The musician, left by himself, sat down to the piano, struck a few hurried and interrupted chords, then became more regular, gradually forgot everything but that in which his very soul became absorbed, and ran on for half an hour, in a varied, emphatic, and phrenzied style, that exactly corresponded with the swelling muscles of his face, the starting veins, and the wild rolling of his eye. The amateurs were so enraptured, that they could not help running into the room to express their delight. But he instantly detected the trick that had been played upon him, and, in a rage, rejected their applause.

A Proclamation by the Governor. EXECUTIVE OFFICE, STATE OF LA., New Orleans, March 8, 1867.

Whereas, The Congress of the United States have passed an act for the more efficient government of the rebel States, and which act is now a law; and

Whereas, Section 5 of said act provides that "when the people of any one of said States shall have formed a constitution of government in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, in all respects framed by a convention of delegates elected by the male citizens of said State twenty-one years old and upward, of whatever race, color, or previous condition, who have been resident in said State for one year previous to the day of such election except such as may be disfranchised for participation in the rebellion or for felony at common law, and when such constitution shall provide that the elective franchise shall be enjoyed by all such persons as have the qualifications herein stated for election of delegates, and when such constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the persons voting on the question of ratification, who are qualified as electors for delegates, and when such constitution shall have been submitted to Congress for examination and approval, and Congress shall have approved the same, and when said State, by a vote of its legislature elected under said Constitution, shall have adopted the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, and when said article shall have become a part of the Constitution of the United States, said State shall be declared entitled to representation in Congress, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom on their taking the oath prescribed by law, and then and thereafter the preceding sections of this bill shall be inoperative in said State: Provided, That no person exclude from the privilege of holding office by said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States shall be eligible to election as a member of the convention to frame a constitution for any of said rebel States, nor shall any such person vote for members of said convention."

Now, therefore, I, J. Madison Wells, Governor of the State of Louisiana, do hereby declare the said act to be in force in the said State, and all elections held from and after this date, either by State, municipal or parochial authority, except in strict conformity to section six of said act of Congress, to be void and of no effect, and all persons elected to office must be able to qualify under said law before they will be allowed to enter on the duties of the same.

OBITUARIES. Died, in Gainesville, Ala., January 28, 1867, WM. H. DANDRIDGE, in the 57th year of his age. Bro. D. was a native of Virginia, but for many years prior to his death, was a citizen of Gainesville, where he lived, respected and esteemed by all. From an early period in life, until his death, Bro. D. was a worthy member of the M. E. Church; adorning his Christian profession by a godly life, and orderly conversation. Bro. D. has no doubt, taken a transfer from the church militant on earth, to the church triumphant in heaven.

J. C. HUGHES.

Call for
J. W. BRADLEY'S
DUPLEX ELLIPTICAL
[Or, Double Spring]
SKIRT!

THEY WILL NOT BEND OR BREAK
Like the Single Spring, but will preserve their perfect and graceful shape when three or four ordinary Skirts are thrown aside as useless—hence are the CHEAPEST.

Each Hoop is made by braiding two springs together, edge to edge, forming the STRONGEST, most FLEXIBLE, and still the LIGHTEST Hoop made.

In fact, for promenade, or the house, or the church, the theatre, or for crowded assemblies, railroad cars, carriages, etc., they are superior to all others, affording COMFORT TO THE WEARER, with that ELEGANCE OF SHAPE which wins favor with all, and has made the "DUPLEX ELLIPTIC"

The Standard Skirt of the Fashionable World.
For misses and young ladies they are superior to all others.

For Sale Everywhere.
Manufactured exclusively by the owners of the Patent,
WESTS, BRADLEY & CARY,
97 Chambers, 79 and 81 Beade Sts, New York.

CAUTION.
The Duplex Skirt will admit a pin being run through the centre of each hoop, thereby proving there are TWO SPRINGS braided together therein, which is the secret of their remarkable STRENGTH and FLEXIBILITY—a combination not possessed by any SINGLE-SPRING Skirt.

The red ink stamp, viz: "J. W. BRADLEY'S Duplex Elliptic Springs" will be found upon the waistband of every Skirt; none other are genuine.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.
The next Spring Session of this well-known Institution will commence on the 10th day of February, 1867. CENTENARY COLLEGE, JACKSON, LOUISIANA.
was established by the State of Louisiana in 1825, and transferred to the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1845. It is now under the joint patronage of the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences.
The College exercises were necessarily suspended during the war; but were regularly resumed, after reorganization, on the first Monday in October, 1865. The approaching session will open on the first Monday of October next.

Tuition, $75 per annum, payable semi-annually in advance.
Boarding can be obtained at from $20 to $25 per month.
The Buildings, Libraries, Apparatus, Laboratory and Society Hall, the location in point of beauty, health, ease of access and good society, are all unsurpassed by those of any institution in the Southern States.

The past history of the College is the pledge of its future prosperity.
The Board and Faculty promise the public that nothing shall be wanting to their part to secure the thorough education of the young men committed to their care, in both Preparatory and Collegiate Departments.
The old students, alumni, and friends of the Institution, are expected to give pecuniary aid to the full reorganization and opening of the College, as stated above.

W. H. WATKINS, President.

SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY, GREENSBORO, ALA.
The exercises of this institution will be resumed on the first Wednesday in October next. Instruction will be given in the Schools of Ancient and Modern Languages, Mathematics, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Chemistry, Natural Philosophy, and Biblical Literature. Civil Engineering and Analytical Chemistry will also be taught.

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE AT BATON ROUGE.

The third session of this school will begin on Wednesday, 3d October, 1866.
The object of this school has ever been to afford a good classical and practical education, or a complete preparation for any stage of a College or University course.

TERMS: Tuition and board, per month, $10.—Payable $200 in advance; balance on the 1st of March.
Every student who enters the school is expected to remain to the close of the session in July, and will be held liable for the bills in full, unless protracted illness shall compel his removal.
Pupils are required to furnish their own bed clothing, towels, wash-basin, mosquito net, etc. Circulars can be obtained by addressing me at Baton Rouge, or Rev. J. C. Keener, D.D., New Orleans, La.

As the number of students is limited, it is earnestly requested that application be made as soon as possible.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

Since the publication of our last number the general market has evinced only moderate animation, although several of the leading articles have undergone a material alteration. Sugar and Molasses have been in less active demand, at higher prices for the latter, and the movement in Western Produce has been limited, attended with an easier feeling in Flour and Corn, and a decline in Pork; while operations in our leading staples have been rather restricted, and under the influence of unfavorable advices from Liverpool and New York, prices have eased off, the market closing at our quotations yesterday, with a tendency to further weakness.

COTTON—On Saturday, the market opened under the adverse influence of a decline at Liverpool and York, but subsequently the advices from the former being more favorable, a better feeling obtained, and sales to the amount of 5800 bales were effected, at prices within the range of previous quotations. On Monday, notwithstanding holders were willing to concede, most buyers were loth to operate, being restrained by the discouraging tenor of the foreign and domestic news, and consequently the sales were restricted, comprising barely 5400 bales, at easier prices. Yesterday, owing to the continued unfavorable advices from Liverpool and New York, the movement exhibited little activity throughout, and hence the sales were light, summing up barely 5200 bales, at prices disclosing greater ease, the market closing decidedly weak, at our quotations.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 16,400 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 7511 bales, against 13,534 during the corresponding period last week, showing a decrease of 6023 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 554,239 bales, against 491,848 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 28,722 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 52,398 bales to Great Britain, of 28,735 to France, and an increase of 11,735 bales to other foreign ports.

TOBACCO—The stock on sale is so small that there is little or no room for making selections or filling orders. Only a few small lots of the new crop have so far been received, and were sold at once. The transactions during the past three days have been confined to 40 hogheads, of which one Medium Leaf at 7c, 3 Large at 3½c, 1 Erosted at 2c, 13 Good Light Leaf at 8c, 1 New Clarksville Leaf at 4c, 1 New Fair Clarksville Leaf at 6½c, 1 at 7c, 2 Good Leaf at 8½c, 1 Low Leaf at 4½c, and 1 New Leaf at 5c. We repeat our previous quotations for reference.

FLOUR—The market has been quiet but steady, with a fair local demand. The sales on Saturday and Monday were confined to 4000 barrels at $10.50 to $10.75 per bbl for Fine, $11.40 to $11.62 for Superfine, $12.12 to $12.25 for Single Extra, $13.25 to $14.25 for Double Extra, $15.12 to $15.25 for Treble Extra, and $16 to $17.50 per bbl for Choice Extra. Yesterday there were sales of 2000 barrels at $9.50 for Common, $11.40 to $11.50 for Superfine, $13 to $13.50 for Double Extra, and $16.15 to $16.50 per bbl for Choice Extra. Arrived during the past three days 11,727 bbls. Cleared for Texas 340, Mississippi 195 bbls.

Monetary.
The Coin market has been quiet, the fluctuations attending the course of prices at New York restraining most dealers from operating. Gold opened on Saturday, nominally at 138½, but subsequently receded and closed weak at 138 to 138½, and opened on Monday at 137½, at a later hour declining, but afterwards rallying, and closing steady at the opening rate, and opened yesterday at 138½, to 139, but later in the day improved and closed firm at 138½ to 139.

RENEWING THE COVENANT.

Mr. Editor: The pastors of the several Methodist Churches in this city, with the Presiding Elder, after repeated interviews upon the subject, having become satisfied, that if our members would consent to adopt the early Methodist practice of renewing their covenant of dedication to God, it would be highly promotive of their spiritual welfare, determined to make an effort to induce them to do so. After due notice, and a day of fasting and prayer, we called them together at the Franklin street church, on Sabbath afternoon, the 24th ult. The attendance was very general, more of our members being present than I ever saw on any former occasion. After preliminary services, the following, and other addresses were made to them, to prepare them to take the step about to be proposed understandingly. All was done with the utmost seriousness, and in the most impressive manner. The covenant appended was then read over, slowly and distinctively, twice, that all might understand what they were requested to do; and at the close of the second reading, all who were willing thus to covenant with God and their brethren, were requested to stand up; when to our joy, a large majority of the membership arose. It was a time of very great solemnity. Deep sobbings of heart—half audible petitions—suppressed sighs, and struggling breaths, with moist eyes, were on every side.

We then sang, still standing—the 1012th Hymn, and sealed the whole with earnest prayer. All I have heard from the members of the church, in prayer and class-meetings, and elsewhere since, is of the most cheering character. Some confess that desires, half-formed purposes of worldly indulgence, were consumed from their hearts like chaff before a devouring fire. But most testify, that they have felt more of the Divine presence since the meeting, than for a long time before. There was a number present, who felt too much timidity and self-distrust, to vow to God, thus openly and solemnly, but we trust that they too were benefited by the occasion, and will be helped on in their christian course. On the whole, we feel that a decided advance was made, that a victory was gained for Zion, and that the occasion will prove the beginning of better days among us.

J. HAMILTON.

ADDRESS.

Beloved Brethren: We, your Pastors, are sorely impressed with the great need there is among us for a higher type of godliness than we have attained to. We see the languishing state of Zion—we mourn over it—we pray for her prosperity—we want your co-operation, and feel assured, that with it and the blessing of God, which is abundantly promised us, we may confidently hope for increasing spiritual prosperity in our charges. We have called you together to ask you to enter this day, as the fathers of Methodism were accustomed to do, upon a solemn, thoughtful, and formal renewal of your covenant with God.

Immeasurable interests are at stake. Your own comfort, — your religious stability, the good of Zion, the welfare of souls, the glory of God! These are some of the interests involved in the step we want you to take. Could your consent be now gained to bind yourselves, by a new and solemn dedication of all your powers and resources to the service of God, and could you be persuaded in a humble, child-like, yet resolute resolve, to enter with increased zeal into the strife with your corruptions, — into a more earnest contest for enlarged measures of faith, and love, and meekness, and joy, and all the graces of the spirit, your whole future life would reflect the glory of this hour: yea, eternity itself, would rehearse with transport, the vows you will have made.

We need not remind you how often you make plans, and enter upon resolves, in reference to worldly good. We need not tell you how carefully and explicitly you have often pledged yourselves to the prosecution of earthly schemes, and how faithfully you have carried out promises, bonds, notes, and even oaths. You have grappled manfully and courageously with these things, and have carried them forward, in spite of occasional failures and constant discouragement. Oh brethren, will you not bring this wakefulness, this decision, this perseverance, this manhood, into your spiritual life! You cannot deny that your christian profession demands this — that it involves in it a solemn pledge to seek the copious anointings of divine grace, and to use diligently all the appointed means for the soul's sanctification and salvation.

While we would not burden you with superfluous perplexing vows, nor attempt to fetter your consciences, or make them obedient to our dictation, we do earnestly desire that you would to-day join us, in a solemn covenant, to forsake all evil, and to cleave steadfastly to that which is good. This you can do — this you ought to do, and this we trust you will do.

The saints of old, did this — all eminently pious children of God, in any age of the church have done it — it was the regular practice of the early Methodists; and it cannot fail, if entered into in the right spirit, to lead us to a higher godliness.

Let not your conscious weakness discourage you; for God has promised strength, and this renewal of your covenant will help to drive you to him for the needed strength. Your very weakness ought to constrain you to enter upon it; for you know that you ought to be a better christian, that you must be a better christian, or you will be lost; and that you are not willing to live or die as you are.

Are you not willing then to resolve with us, that you will be, God helping, what you ought to be, or what you hope to be; and that you will betake yourselves, with earnestness or diligence, to that discipline which will lead you to this blessing? Will you not to-day, and even now, bind yourselves, by solemn, formal, and open covenant with God, and your brothers and sisters, to enter, from this hour, upon a consistent, and thorough, and constant course of holy living?

Oh that we could bear each one of you say, "I am ready; for the resolve — ready to enter now and forever with you upon this struggle for holiness." And now that we may have something definite to guide us in this solemn struggle, we propose, that as the children of God we agree, and pledge ourselves to an effort to carry out the following covenant, made this day, and in this hour, with God, and with each other. Assembled in the presence of God, the omnipotent, the omniscient, the immutable Jehovah, our judge, knowing that his holy and blessed will ought to determine everything, and that his government ought to be the joy of all his creatures; and remembering that we are professedly his children, and should therefore desire to do all his holy will, and be fully consecrated to him, and feeling fully assured if we are, he will graciously own, and wonderfully bless us with his favor and joy.

We do, therefore, with fear and distrust of our own strength, but in humble reliance upon the grace and help of God, unitedly and individually, make and enter into the following covenant with our God and Saviour.

(SILENT PRAYER FOR THREE MINUTES.)

We do now and here, give up and dedicate to him and his service, our souls and bodies, powers and possessions, to serve him, and be employed for his glory, according to the teachings of his word and spirit.

We renounce, and will forsake all and every sin; we will do every duty made known to us, by his word or spirit, by his Divine assistance. We will not study our own care or pleasure, but the will and pleasure of God.

We will henceforth cultivate the spirit of charity and love, toward all men, especially, towards all the children of God. We will refrain from all evil, unkind, and uncharitable speaking of our christian brethren.

We will be more regular, punctual, and earnest in prayer, in watching, in fasting, and in reading the word of God.

We will labor and pray more constantly and fervently, for the salvation of souls, and to build up the church. And as without blemish no man can see the Lord. We will from this time forward, seek and labor for an entire sanctification of our souls, bodies and powers, to be holy before God. And O Lord, if in any hour of temptation, or season of trial, we are in danger of being overcome, do thou graciously remember this Covenant and come to our rescue.

"And when thou seest the agonies of dissolving nature upon us, then, O most Merciful, call to mind this, our Covenant, though we should be incapable of recollecting it, and look with pity upon thy dying children. Put strength and confidence into our departing spirits, and receive them to thyself."

PROTESTANT CHILDREN. AT CATHOLIC SCHOOLS.

Roman Catholic schools have the reputation of guarding children, especially girls, more carefully from improper associations, and outside influences, than Protestant schools. If this be so, (and I am not prepared to admit it,) the Trustees and Faculties of Protestant Schools, should see to it, that it is the case no longer. This, so far as I know, is the one single advantage, that is, or possibly can be claimed for the schools of Romanists.

There are in our apprehension various and serious objections to Roman schools.

We cannot believe that monks and nuns can be as good educators, as those who are identified with the domestic and social relations of life. What just enlightened practical ideas of the world, and of every day life can a nun have? From early childhood she has been secluded in a convent school, and while yet in her teens took the veil, and by solemn vows secluded and separated herself forever from the world, and consecrated her life to devotion. Education implies more than a mere acquaintance with the text books of the scholastic course; it implies a knowledge of society, its manners and sentiments. What can the nun know of these? Education especially, in its application to girls, is a knowledge of domestic and social life. We should suppose, the nun, from her education and peculiar mode of life, almost incapable of imparting the domestic and social elements of an education. These remarks are almost equally applicable to the monks.

So far as the literary aspects of the question are involved, there is no proof known to us, that Romanist schools for boys, or girls, turn out better scholars than Protestant schools.

There is no proof that the graduates of Romanist institutions are any better talkers, or writers, or that they succeed better, in any relation, department, or enterprise. In short, we see no reason for preferring Romanist to Protestant schools.

It is, however, the religious aspect of the question that gives it its chief importance in our apprehension. We assume it as beyond debate, that Protestants are such from intelligent conviction; between themselves and the Romanist there is the most clearly defined antagonism.

Protestants are tolerant, and upon their principles must be so — if anywhere, or at any time, they have been intolerant, they have been in antagonism with themselves. Freedom to worship God, is and must be a fundamental principle of Protestantism. Romanists are intolerant, and must be so, if consistent with themselves, whatever policy, or power may have done bore and there to restrain and modify the manifestation of their persecuting spirit. All who differ from them are heretics. There is no salvation outside the pale of their church.

As all who differ from them are radically wrong, and teaching "damnable heresies," they must forbid them, and where they have the power, prohibit them. This is the case in the most Catholic states, and above all, in Rome itself, where the Pope has been at the same time spiritual and political ruler. Very recently, Protestant churches have been closed by order of the Pope himself. We hold it is a legitimate inference, that Protestant churches would be closed here, as they have been in Rome, and entirely forbidden as they are in Cuba, if the supreme Pontiff possessed as much power as he does in Rome. How can a Protestant, who is a Protestant, because he holds to, and exercises the right of private judgment, send his child to be taught by teachers who deny that right, and prohibit its exercise, when, and wherever in their power? How can a Protestant send his child where it is openly professed and taught that Protestantism is a heresy, and all Protestants certainly, and hopelessly damned.

Protestants hold and teach that it is the right of every man to "search," and read the Holy Scriptures in their native tongue. Romanists prohibit the reading of the Holy Scriptures in the modern languages, except by special permit from the Priest. The popes have issued Bulls condemning the Bible society movement, to circulate among all men the word of God without note or comment. Romanists in the early days of the Reformation, did all they could to prevent the translation and publication of the Bible, and one of their Bishops remarked, "we must put down printing, or printing will put us down."

The Romanist have elevated the virgin Mary to a semi-Divinity, calling her the "mother of God," and making her the chief object of address in their prayers; and their religion looks far more like Maryolatry, than Christianity.

The Romanist make it essential to salvation to believe that the bread and wine consecrated, and used in the Holy Sacrament of the Supper, are the real body and blood, soul, and Divinity of Christ, "God manifested in the flesh," and that their priest have power to work the wonderful transubstantiation.

The Romanist holds that all souls, with the exception of one or so in a million, that die in the "odor of sanctity," must pass through purgatorial fires, to be purified for heaven, thus ignoring the efficiency of the blood of Christ, and adding a new unscriptural article to the faith of Christianity.

By sending our children to Romanist schools, we give "aid and comfort" to these stupendous errors; we aid Romanists to propagate their heresies, we endorse them.

How do Romanists act in this matter? Do they patronize Protestant schools? No. They will not commit their children to Protestant training, because they believe Protestants teach and hold to great errors in religion. Many thousands in this city will not send to the Public schools, which are intended to be simply literary, and neutral in religion; but Catholics believe their religious opinions are true, Christian, and infinitely important, and therefore wish to have their children taught them. It is "passing strange" to us, that Protestants who profess to believe their religious opinions, scriptural and infinitely important, can be indifferent whether their children are taught to regard their views as truths or heresies. If teaching can Romanize our children then they will be Romanized at Catholic schools, where they will constantly hear that the Holy Roman Church is the only true church, and that there is salvation in none other. Such teaching on young and impressionable minds must exercise a powerful influence. The proof of this is seen in the large number of students from Protestant families, who come out of these institutions Romanized.

The Romanist teachers are quite too shrewd, and politic to make (as a rule,) formal and open attempts to proselyte, this would arouse suspicion, and awaken opposition, but by winning ways, and indirect, and slow approaches, they surely accomplish their aims, and Protestant parents mourn their folly, when the deed has been done, and their children have been forever separated from themselves, in faith and worship.

We have in every Southern State, several institutions of high grade, for girls and boys, where they can receive the best educational advantages, where their morals and manners will be cared for, with the solicitude of parental care and love, and where they will be taught, "the Holy Scriptures which are able to make them wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus."

Mr. Editor, I have never been connected with a literary institution, and have no prospect of being so, proximate, or remote. I write simply in the interest of the truth, as it is held and taught by Protestants. Consistency and self-respect demands that as Protestants, we should train up our children in our faith, but if we send them to be trained by monks and nuns, what becomes of consistency, and self-respect?

Funeral Obsequies of Bishop Soule.

The Nashville Banner of the 8th, says:

The funeral of Bishop Soule took place yesterday. The gathering at McKendree Church was large, and the ceremonies imposing. Inside, the building was festooned with crape, and folds of the dark symbol of mourning encircled the pillars and covered the altar, while the gloom of a darksome day without seemed in sympathy with the occasion, as the deep toned bell sent its slow, solemn and long-drawn echoes of the dreary death-knell out upon the air, heralding the flight of a pure and great soul to its eternal home.

A wreath intertwined with snow-white flowers and a cross of green leaves were laid upon the coffin, as it was deposited in front of the altar by ten pall-bearers, and an impressive silence was preserved while the preliminary ceremonies were being conducted by Dr. Young, Dr. Sawrie and Rev. C. C. Mayhew.

Bishop McTyeire delivered an address, which he prefaced by stating that it was not his intention to attempt what was technically called a funeral discourse, but that he would only cite some passages in the life of Bishop Soule, which might refresh our gratitude to God and lead us to follow the noble example which had been laid before us.

He then proceeded to give an elaborate and eloquent sketch of the life and services of the deceased, concluding with the following interesting account of Bishop Soule's last moments:

I was present at the hour he died, and saw the close of his grand Christian life. His work was done, and he waited in patience and in peace. His death, in all its parts, was simply grand, majestic. Death is a cloud, a shadow, a darkness; he saw it enter with perfect composure. He said little in his last hours. On Saturday his situation became critical, but there was no trepidation, no uneasiness to be detected in his conversation — he "was ready."

When asked if he suffered much pain, he replied, "None at all." I said to him, "Is all clear before you?" "Yes," was his answer. "Do you understand me?" "I do sir, I do." It was past midnight when he appeared to be passing away. I questioned him, "Bishop, is it all right with you?" With that beautiful emphasis characteristic of him, he replied, "All right, sir, all right." He was resting — leaning on Christ. He expired in perfect quietness; fell asleep without a groan or convulsion, and I could feel no grief or sorrow as I closed his eyes.

After the singing of a hymn and a prayer by Dr. Bunting, the friends of the deceased were permitted to take a last look at the familiar features which were so soon to be hidden beneath the cold sod. The scene was very impressive, and even the colored people in the gallery descended to gaze once more upon the face of one whom they respected and loved.

At the conclusion of the ceremonies, the procession was formed, ten clergymen moving in advance of the pall bearers, and a long train of hacks bringing up the rear. The body was interred in the city cemetery, Dr. Summers performing the burial service, but delivering no address, the points upon which he might have been expected to touch, and which he has so ably and so eloquently handled in the article on our first page, having been almost fully embraced in Bishop McTyeire's discourse.

Singing by Spurgeon's Congregation.

A writer to the Western Presbyterian thus describes the singing as he heard it recently of Spurgeon's congregation, London:

The hymn was read, entirely through, and each verse was read before it was sung. The singing was started — not led — by a person who stood beside Mr. Spurgeon. I welcomed the familiar notes of Old Hundred, and for the first time for several months, essayed to join in singing it. But I was surprised into silence by the manner in which the audience took possession of the tune. The most powerful organ, if there had been any thing of the kind used, could not have led them. The second hymn was announced to be, Jesus, Lover of my Soul. The preacher said, "Let us sing this precious hymn softly to the tune of Pleyel's Hymn." When the first verse had been sung, and after he had read the second, he said, "Sing it softly!" With a countenance uplifted and beaming with fervor, his book in both hands, keeping time involuntarily to the music, he sang with the congregation. When he had read the third verse, he said, "You do not sing it softly enough!" They sang it, softly. It was as though some mighty hand had dammed up the waters of the Falls of Niagara, leaving a thin sheet to creep through between two fingers and make soft, sweet music in its great lap and plunge into the great basin below. Then when he had read the fourth verse, he said, "Now if we feel this we will sing it with all our might," and the great congregation burst forth into song. It was as though the Great Hand had been suddenly uplifted, and the gathered waters were rushing on their united way in awful grandeur.

I have heard the members of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church, with a great company of their wives, and daughters, and friends, sing Old Hundred with a fervor that thrilled me; I have heard oratorios rendered in Exeter Hall by a thousand selected voices, five hundred instruments, and a great organ; I have heard operas rendered in the Imperial Opera House of the French Emperor by a great number of the best vocalists and musicians that could be found in Europe, but I have never heard music so pathetic, grand and soul-stirring as that made by those who worshipped with me in the Metropolitan Tabernacle. I was too much carried away to take part in it myself. Mr. Spurgeon always uses those "precious hymns" and the old loved tunes.

MEMPHIS CONFERENCE CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. Editor:

Your excellent paper, in a new and beautiful dress, folded in quarto form, which I think decidedly preferable to the large and unhandy folio of former days, has been a regular visitor to my humble home for some weeks past. This is a favor highly appreciated on my part for many reasons, but, chiefly, on account of the manly, straightforward, and independent course which it pursues in defence of our time-honored church economy, which has so long survived almost every form of opposition, and has been proved by a blessed experience, wonderfully efficient in spreading scriptural holiness over the land, in opposition to the innovations of modern ecclesiastical radicalism.

The friends of Lay Representation seem to take the prospect of defeat very hard, indeed. And the efforts which some of them are making to throw the whole responsibility of defeat on the Baltimore Conference, if it is finally defeated—is, to say the least of it, unkind and disingenuous. I do hope that grand old Conference, in one sense, the mother of us all, will march up to this question in the same spirit of fearless independence, which has ever characterized her, and stand as a stone-wall in opposition to the fearful tide of "changes in economy" which threaten, at no distant day, to sweep from us the last vestige of our beloved Methodism. The amiable Editor of our own Memphis Advocate will do as hard on this subject, as almost any one who advocates it, for he is exceedingly filled with it, as is evidenced from the fact, that, though he considers the matter "now" of "no great practical importance," yet he continues to give us all the scraps he can glean from his exchanges, that in any wise bear on the subject; hence, the lengthy extract which he makes from the Southern Christian Advocate, in his issue of Feb. 7, and endorses with so much pleasure. Now, I am willing that my good brother of the Memphis Advocate should enjoy all the "pleasure" he can derive from that source, but there is one thing closely connected with it that I am not willing to allow. He thinks that "a correspondent of the New Orleans Christian Advocate certainly labored under a mistake" in supposing that the friends of Lay Representation were more unwilling than its opponents, to discuss the question at length at the session of the Memphis Conference. Now, that correspondent thought he saw a disposition to ignore the discussion of this subject, by the movers of it, in the General Conference last spring, and from what he saw, and heard, at the session of the Memphis Conference last fall, he was of the opinion that the advocates of this measure were opposed to discussion, and he thinks so still. It is no use to try to excuse this matter, by saying, the subject had been fully discussed privately, and through the press, and that the brethren were fully informed, etc. I have found that this was not the case in all instances. Some, I think, voted in the dark. Others, seemed to vote from prudential considerations. One of the oldest and most influential members of the Memphis Conference, who voted against it in the General Conference, in the Annual Conference, voted for it, saying: "I believe it will soon break down with its own weight," or words to that amount. Does this look like the question was well understood?

The Southern Christian Advocate says the subject has been "fully discussed"—"amply discussed," in these columns. "The fearless and powerful champion of the conservative party—Dr. Sassenett—taking part therein," and, as to the result, the same paper says, "we may say without boasting, that these discussions settled the question in the sphere of our circulation." Of course it is right to hear with this same confident boasting, but, I confess, I should like to see the weapons with which that fearless and powerful champion—the lamented Sassenett—was slain. Some of us have certainly been unfortunate in being situated beyond the range of the condescensions of light emanating from that valuable paper—the Southern Christian Advocate.

Why force Lay Representation upon the Laity? They don't want it, and as far as I can learn, they don't care enough, even to talk about it, except in the most incidental manner; and, as far as I can learn, the most intelligent laymen regard it as impracticable and undesirable. Since the decision of the question in 1823, they have not asked any such thing. Then the ministry thought that they could not, consistently with our Itinerant mode of operation, give it to them. The church went on, and prospered wonderfully without it, and in 1866, the ministry rise up and propose to force it upon them, whether they ask for it or not. A leading advocate of this strange move on the part of the ministry, at the last General Conference, when it was said the people have not asked for it and don't want it, replied significantly, "we want them to want it." But why so? Would it not be time enough to give it when they ask for it—when they begin to show a willingness to co-operate with us in this way.

But it is suggested that the matter having gone so far, if it should fall now, it would place the ministry in an unenviable relation to the laity—how so? It would be the Annual Conferences correcting the errors of their representatives in General Conference, which they have a clear constitutional right to do. The unenviable relation would be abundantly more manifest, if the measure were carried through and then fail; as I feel sure it would, in its practical operation. There would be no disastrous consequences attending the failure of this utopian scheme in church politics, so far as my knowledge and observation extend.

The religious interests of this section of the church, are not of the most encouraging character. The winter, for the most part, has been unfavorable to our work. November and December were cold and wet months, which rendered traveling disagreeable, and sometimes impracticable; congregations small, quarterly conferences thinly attended, so there was but little done during those months. January was dry, but cold. February has alternated between wet and dry, cold and hot. We have lately had changes from the warm and pleasant weather of spring to the piercing cold of mid-winter, within the space of a few hours. Altogether we have had an unusual winter, and we have accomplished nothing beyond the usual routine of church duties. Indeed, it is not expected that anything will be done till the revival season comes, which usually takes place in the latter part of summer. This is probably wrong, but such is the custom.

The prospects of a crop this year are better, I think, than at any time since the war. There are more laborers employed, a larger amount of land is in the course of preparation for the usual crops of the country, and the freedmen show a little more disposition to work than heretofore. So it is hoped that there is some improvement in this department, and that the farmers will succeed better than they did last year. But there is yet great room for improvements. There is a great amount of idleness and improvidence among the freedmen, and many of them came out in debt at the end of the last year; and it is generally the opinion of the people, that, while they feel relieved of a great responsibility in the freedom of the negro, and have no wish to incur it again, the condition of this unfortunate race is immensely worse than when in slavery. Many of them find it difficult to make a support for their families, and there are causes operating, which, if not corrected, will, in the roll of years, result in the extinction of the race. But the Lord reigneth, let the earth keep silence before Him.

February, 1867.

OBSERVER.

VENTILATION.

Mr. Editor: We see in the Northern Methodist paper in this city, of the 9th ult., that the editor, in referring to the fraternal relation existing between the M. E. Church, South, and the A. M. E. Church, says: "the time has come to ventilate this subject."

In his issue of the 16th ult., appears what we suppose to be his ventilator, in an article headed

"HOW THEY AFFILIATE."

He commences the article thus: "We think it is fully time that the public should understand the strange movements of the A. M. E. Church, and the unexpected course it has seen fit to pursue in regard to our work here." We affirm the following facts:

"1. The A. M. E. Church, bitterly opposes the M. E. Church, in her work among the colored people." We have no knowledge of anything mysterious in the fraternal relation existing between the M. E. Church, South, and the A. M. E. Church. Our work is to preach the pure gospel of Christ, to seek the true interest of the race with whom we are identified; to employ every means for their enlightenment, and to secure their and our own elevation, politically and religiously. In view of these considerations, we believe it to be our duty to strive for peace, and to pursue it with all men. We do not perceive the correctness of the idea, that anything is to be gained in the right direction, by men professing to be ministers of the gospel, and missionaries to the freedmen, all the time putting forth efforts to arouse prejudice and malice, in the minds of a poor, ignorant, and inexperienced people, by referring to their former condition and treatment. Now, true religion teaches us to forget injuries, and to forgive wrongs. But the emissaries of the M. E. Church, are endeavoring rather to foster an antagonist spirit. They tell the freedmen, that the M. E. Church, South, is their enemy. Proof, because she held slaves, and her ministers and members took part in the rebellion. In view of these facts, they advise these unsophisticated people not to accept anything that will advance their own interests from the M. E. Church, South, for fear that it may look like ignoring the past. If it is a mark of religion to excite the slumbering feuds between these parties, we crave more light. If slavery is such a heinous sin, as the missionaries of the M. E. Church represent it to be, when they are laboring with their black children, we would call attention to an item in the history of the Mother Church. If we mistake not, at a General Conference of that body, held in Buffalo, New York, in May, 1860, between twenty-eight and thirty thousand slaves were reckoned as church property, and such, they remained until freed by Lincoln's proclamation. Considering her previous relations, we do not think the Mother has much liberty living to boast of. We do not suppose that the Editor of the N. O. Advocate would presume to affirm that there were no traitors in the Mother Church. But the gentleman's mind is beclouded. He cannot see "how the gratuitous gift of thousands annually by the Mother Church, to her black children can turn to her financial benefit." A brief statement may make the matter less improvable. For instance, in those localities where the colored people have neither a house of worship, nor grounds, the agents of the M. E. Church, North, will buy a lot for church purposes, paying, perhaps, $500, or a $1000. They will make arrangements for a large building. They will purchase material enough to commence the structure, which, when completed will cost $1500, $2000, $3000. The agent will say after the thing is started, "well now that is all the Mother can do for her black children at this point. She has many to help. You must do the balance yourselves." Good investment. This course has been pursued in Jefferson city, the Third District, Baton Rouge, Thibodeauxville, and, as far as we have been informed, in every place where that church has set up its standard. Again, in some localities, they influence congregations to unite with them, who have control of property accumulated, while connected with the M. E. Church, South, this turns to their "financial benefit." The church in this city has been rather a paying institution, for it reports $55,000.00, and has a membership of two thousand. We cite it as a case in point. They are told by those agents, that the A. M. E. Church is their enemy; as a proof, the fact, that she affiliates with the M. E. Church, South. This church, has taken much interest in the colored people of the South, and has made them, (at least) the Methodist portion of them, all they are in morals and religion, and is yet doing what it can for the enlightenment and elevation of this people.

We believe that the A. M. E. Church, is the church for the colored Methodist of this country, and it is our sincere prayer to the great Head of the church, that they will soon see the importance of uniting with the A. M. E. Church. In Union there is strength.

I am Sir, with much Respect,
Yours, etc.

A Minister of the A. M. E. Church, for FIFTEEN YEARS.

DEATH OF BISHOP SOULE.

Bishop Soule died at the house of his son-in-law, Dr. Conwell, on College street, Nashville, on Wednesday morning, March 6, 1867, at five minutes after three o'clock.

Until Tuesday, Feb. 26, the Bishop continued in his usual health; but on that day he was attacked by dysentery; and despite the unremitting attentions of his family and friends, and the professional aid of eminent physicians—Drs. R. K. Martin, Cheatham, Bowling, Briggs—the disease proved unmanageable. By Saturday, March 2, it was evident that he was sinking fast, though he could still converse sparingly. He suffered but little. When we asked him if he thought he would die of that attack, he said, with emphasis, "I have no doubt of it." Throughout his last illness he was himself, calm and serene—we were going to say, majestic even in death. His junior colleague, Bishop McTear, had the mournful satisfaction of sitting up with him the night of his death, and closing his eyes.

Some years since, we took down from the Bishop's lips certain biographical data which we thought would be of interest to the Church—from these memoranda we have prepared the paragraphs which follow:

Joshua Soule was born in Bristol, Maine—then a province belonging to Massachusetts—August 1, 1781. He was the fifth son of Joshua and Mary Soule. His father was the eldest son of Joseph Soule, a descendant of George Soule, one of the Pilgrim Fathers who came to New England in the Mayflower.

His father was captain of a merchant-vessel and a whaler; and he would have continued in a seafaring life, but for the loss of his vessels during the revolutionary war. After this he devoted himself to the pursuit of agriculture.

At the time of the birth of their son Joshua, they belonged to a Scotch Presbyterian congregation under the pastorate of the Rev. Mr. McLain. After their removal to the country, their house was a home for all ministers, who preached in it, but organized no Church.

The first Methodist preacher who came into their neighborhood, was Jesse Lee. This apostle of New England Methodism was the first Methodist minister Joshua ever heard. This was about 1793. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in the spring of 1797—two preachers having been sent on a circuit, which embraced his home. His parents and friends were violently opposed to his becoming a Methodist, and he joined the Church under full expectation of being banished from his father's house. Before taking this step he conferred with his parents in reference to it. He challenged them to adduce an instance in which he had ever disobeyed them. He assured them that it would afford him the greatest pleasure in life to join the Methodist Church with their consent; but join it he must. His mother was almost distracted. His father, however, never prohibited him from going to meeting. On one occasion he asked his father to accompany him to hear one of his ministers—the Rev. Mr. Stebbins. He said, "No; they are all alike." Joshua expressed the hope that his father's law judged no man before he was heard. After dinner, his father ordered two horses, and accompanied his son to the meeting. Mr. Stebbins preached a powerful sermon. After the service Joshua introduced his father to Mr. Stebbins, who, on invitation, went home with Captain Soule. Joshua told Mr. Stebbins about his father, and advertised him that he might expect controversy. Accordingly, after supper they entered the lists—not without some apprehension on the part of Joshua, as his father was strong on the dogmas in question. But Mr. Stebbins got the better in the argument, and Captain Soule felt it. After breakfast the next morning, he invited Mr. Stebbins to preach in his house. This he did, the next round, to a large congregation—two or three Baptist ministers being present. The sermon was a powerful one—on the vision of the dry bones in Ezekiel. From that time, Captain Soule's house was a regular preaching place. In less than six months after Joshua joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, his father, mother, two brothers, and two sisters, joined it also. Some years after, his parents died in the communion of the Church, and in holy triumph.

Joshua Soule was never an exhorter or a local preacher. He received license to preach, and recommendation to the itinerancy, from a Quarterly Conference in the latter part of the year 1798; he traveled under the Presiding Elder till the session of the Annual Conference in June, 1799.

He was admitted on trial by the New England Conference at that session, and was appointed to Portland Circuit, in Maine—Timothy Merritt being the preacher in charge, and Joshua Taylor the Presiding Elder. It was a four weeks' circuit, five hundred miles in circumference, and comprising twenty-seven appointments.

In 1800, he was sent to Union River, the lowest circuit in Maine, embracing Penobscot, and extending to the British lines. That year he had no colleague.

In 1801, he was sent to the Sandwich circuit, near Cape Cod—without a colleague.

In 1802, he was sent to Needham Circuit, with Thomas Percy as an assistant.

At the close of his second year, he started to Conference at Boston, by sea, but did not reach there until after the close of the session; he was, however, admitted into full connection, and elected deacon. At the close of his third year, he was ordained deacon at Cranston, Rhode Island, by Bishop Whatcoat; and at the close of his fourth year he was ordained elder by the same Bishop.

In 1803, he received his fifth appointment, which was to Nantucket—without a colleague. This year he was married to Miss Sarah Allen, an orphan, in Providence, Rhode Island. With her he lived in conjugal felicity for fifty-four years. We shall never forget his look of sorrow and hope, when, in May, 1857, we consigned her remains to the tomb.

In 1805 and 1806, he was Presiding Elder on a District, which embraced the entire territory of Maine—1200 miles in circumference, comprising twelve circuits and one station. He visited the remotest cabins, frequently covered with snow, which beat in upon him. Sometimes, indeed, he had to sleep out in the frost, baving the snow for his bed, and the sky for his covering. He swam streams, and encountered many other hardships. During the two years that he was on that District, and counting every day that he spent at home, he was only three weeks with his young wife. This, he assured us, he never could have done, if she had not been an extraordinary woman, and encouraged him in his arduous and self-denying work.

In 1808 and 1807, the District being divided, he traveled the lower part, known as the Kennebec District. Bishop Ashbury said, when he made the appointment, that he gave Joshua Soule the eastern section, which was much harder than the other, as he feared that Oliver Beale, who was appointed to the upper portion, would break down on the lower. During these two years he performed a vast amount of laborious service.

The next four years, he was Presiding Elder on the lower Portland District. In 1808, he attended the General Conference in Baltimore. At that session the plan of a delegated General Conference was adopted; and the grave responsibility was devolved on him to draw up the Constitution, as it now appears in the Book of Discipline.

In 1812, he was stationed in Lynn. That year he attended the session of the General Conference held in New York.

The next three years he traveled the Kennebec District. He was a member of the General Conference of 1816; at which he was elected Book Agent and Editor of the Methodist Magazine. For four years he performed the arduous and apparently incompatible duties of these offices with great fidelity.

His position as Book Agent was at first singularly embarrassing. The Book Concern was in its infancy; it could not get discount for five hundred dollars. The stock was old, and comparatively valueless. His predecessor, Daniel Hunt, was a good and faithful man, but did not possess the requisite business qualifications for an undertaking so difficult and responsible. Mr. Soule immediately opened new books; and as a loan of money was indispensable, he procured it from the Mechanics' Bank in Baltimore—his friends, Philip Littig and John Bryce, endorsing for him. The Book Concern prospered under his administration. He had no difficulty afterward in getting all the money he wanted—even during the tremendous financial crisis which occurred while he was in the agency. He made the Magazine a useful and interesting miscellany—the more so, as this was before the era of Christian Advocates. But we have frequently heard him deary his own editorial capacity, pleasantly observing that the editing of the Magazine was a work of darkness, as it was performed chiefly at night, after the daily duties of his agency were closed.

In 1820 he was succeeded, as Agent and Editor, by Dr. Bangs, being himself elected to the Episcopate. He, however, respectfully declined consecration, in view of what is known as the Presiding Elder question. He never would consent to execute the office of Bishop, if the Presiding Elders were elected by the Annual Conference. He always considered that act as one of great importance; and Bishop Waugh told him, in after years, that by his firmness, on that occasion, he saved the Church. That year he was stationed in the city of New York.

In 1821 he was stationed in New York, as preacher in charge.

In 1822 and 1823 he was preacher in charge of the Churches in Baltimore City Station. Here he was greatly beloved and admired. When, some years after, we followed him, as junior preacher in the same station, we found that his name was as aointment poured forth.

The session of the Baltimore Conference for 1824 was held in Winchester, Va. Although strong opposition was made to him because of his decided stand on the Presiding Elder question, yet he was elected to the General Conference, and his name stood first in the list of delegates. His opponents, Messrs. Emory, Waugh, Griffith, and Morgan, were all left out. In after years they all saw their error, and made honorable apologies to Bishop Soule for the course they had pursued. At the General Conference, which was held that year in Baltimore, he was re-elected to the Episcopate, and was ordained by Bishops McKendree, George, and Roberts. From that time until he was forced by the weight of years and increasing infirmities to retire from active service, he was abundant in labors, scoring ease and self-indulgence, consecrating all his powers to the difficult and responsible work which had been assigned him by the Church.

At the General Conference held in Baltimore, in 1840, he was chosen as the Representative of the Methodist Episcopal Church to the British Conference—a wise and happy selection. He chose as his associate in that embassy, the son of his old friend, the Rev. Dr. Sargent—the Rev. Thomas B., now Dr. Sargent, of the Virginia Conference, than whom a more fitting minister could not be found. The impression they made upon the British and Irish Conferences was very great. The Bishop made them acquainted with the principles and workings of American Methodism, and greatly heightened their estimation of our system. Some of their foremost men expressed a wish that their Connection was under the government of such men as the venerable Bishop and his colleagues. We chanced to be in New York in 1842, when the Bishop and Dr. Sargent returned from Europe, and we well remember the glowing terms in which they spoke of their reception in England and Ireland, and the veneration with which, as Dr. Sargent told us, the Bishop was received by the transatlantic brethren "You received us," said Dr. Sargent in the Irish Conference, "as angels unawares." "And so you are angels!" responded a warm-hearted Irish preacher. The Bishop, we may observe in passing, seemed to be specially pleased with the Irish, and when traveling in Ireland he was treated with all the reverence they thought due to a lord bishop indeed!

From Good Words.

ANGER.

It is to be feared that many good people have very bad tempers. It is to be feared, too, that a bad temper is very often regarded as a misfortune rather than a sin. Men think that they are born to it; that it is no fault of theirs; that their temper deserves the sympathy of their friends rather than censure. They seem to regard it rather as they would regard a heavy mortgage on an inherited estate, or any other evil that had come upon them from accident or the wrong doing of other people.

And yet there are terrible sentences in the New Testament about unjustifiable and uncontrollable anger. To yield to ungoverned passion is to "give place to the devil." To be "angry without a cause" is to be "in danger of the judgment."

No doubt there are occasions when it is a duty to be angry; and whoever is not angry with his brother when there is a cause, neglects a duty. The constitution of our nature indicates that anger is not always a transgression of the Divine law. We are so made that pity is not more naturally awakened by the sight of suffering, fear by the approach of danger, delight by the vision of beauty, gratitude by deeds of generous kindness, than anger by many kinds of wrong-doing. Bishop Butler says, "that anger, in its impulsive form, is intended to be a sudden injury, and to be a standing menace, in the form of settled resentment, against deliberate injustice," but it has far higher ends to answer than mere self-defence.

The calm, passionless nature which is with some men the highest type of goodness, is not the Christian ideal either of human or divine perfection. It was never yet associated either with saintliness or heroism. The men whose hearts never glow with enthusiasm at witnessing lofty self-sacrifice, never burn with indignation against cowardice, falsehood, and profligacy; the men whose eyes never flash, whose pulse never quickens, whose words move on in an unbroken flow, and never rush along tumultuously, like a cataract, either in praise or blame, never yet did any work worth doing either for God or man. They are mere machines, not living souls. They would be hardly the worse if they had no hearts at all. They may talk of principle being better than passion; "both are best," both are necessary to a perfect life. It may be a less serious misfortune for the flesh to fall away than for the bones to be broken or diseased; but the hard angular skeleton, scarcely concealed by the skin, is an ungracious and ghastly object; and unless the solid framework of principle is well covered with the warm flesh and blood of kindly and generous passion, a man's character has neither health nor beauty.

The people who do us most good are those whose affections are as true to God and righteousness as their judgments and their consciences. Right principle is the logic of human character; right feeling is its rhetoric; by which we are strongly moved. If my friend's heart throbs faster when he speaks to me of the love of Christ, I not only see that I ought to love Christ, but my own heart begins to glow; if he quivers with indignation when he speaks of meanness, treachery, selfishness, I not only see that these things are evil, but I begin to abhor them.

Righteous anger, restrained but not quenched, has wonderful power in it. Adam Smith has accurately observed that "the proper expression of just indignation composes many of the most splendid and admired passages both of ancient and modern eloquence." But we have higher examples of it than the Philippics of Demosthenes or the Orations of Cicero against Cataline. The ancient prophets did not discuss the sins of the Hebrew people with philosophical serenity, nor condemn them with judicial calmness; some of their discourses are tempestuous with passion. The words of Christ Himself are often terrible from the indignation they express; gentle as He was, there was no weakness in Him. He looked upon hypocrites with "anger, being grieved because of the hardness of their hearts." His denunciations sometimes burn with a white heat. And the eternal appeal which His law makes to the conscience of man—"His wrath is revealed from Heaven against all unrighteousness;" "He is angry with the wicked every day." Perhaps one reason why modern preaching is less powerful than it might be, is because it does not well sufficiently upon the depth and intensity of God's delight in man's well-doing and the fierceness of His indignation at sin.

It is possible, then, to "be angry," and to "sin not." Jonah was mistaken when he said that he would be angry, but there are times when we do exceedingly ill if we feel no anger. To quote again from Bishop Butler, who has a far better claim to the epithet "judicious" than Richard Hooker: "The indignation raised by envy and the injustice, and the desire of having it punished, which persons unconcerned would feel, is by no means malice. No, it is resentment against vice and wickedness, it is one of the common bonds by which society is held together, a fellow-feeling which each individual has in behalf of the whole species as well as of himself. And it does not appear that this, generally speaking, is at all too high amongst mankind."

There are times, therefore, if we are like Christ, and bear the Divine image, when we shall be angry. Nor do I see any reason why we should never speak until our anger is over. Anger is meant to make the condemnation of sin more effective; to wait till it has cooled down is to forget that fire is sometimes wanted to subdue a stubborn material as well as force. It is a great calamity to a child if its parents act on the foolish theory that they should never reprove or punish except in cold blood; some parents, indeed, have so little control over their passion, that to wait till their anger is over may be a humiliating necessity; but still the child suffers. There is nothing more intolerable than a cold censure for grave faults. It is infinitely worse to bear than indignation, and it is less effective. It looks like cruelty. It provokes resentment. The remembrance of it is like a cancer in the soul. Parental love must be strongly moved—moved with anger as well as sorrow—when a child has committed sin; if a parent waits until all the emotion has gone, the reproof and the punishment have all the harshness of authority unalleviated by the tenderness of affection.

But anger, like every other active principle of our nature, may escape from the control of reason and conscience, and then it is most mischievous both to ourselves and others.

Fire mastered by man's skill, working even fiercely under his command, is one of his most efficient servants; but fire, in revolt against man's authority, is one of his most terrible foes. "Pride," says an ancient author, "robs me of God, envy of my neighbour, anger of myself;" he might have said, Anger makes me the slave of the devil, the curse of my neighbour, and my own worst torment.

Some people seem to live in a perpetual storm, calm weather can never be reckoned upon in their company. Suddenly, when you least expect it, without any adequate reason, and almost without any reason at all, the sky becomes black, and the wind rises, and there is growling thunder and pelting rain. You can hardly tell where the tempest came from. An accident for which no one can be rightly blamed, a misunderstanding which a moment's calm thought would have terminated, a chance word which meant no evil, a trifling difficulty which good sense might have removed at once, a slight disappointment which a cheerful heart would have borne with a smile, brings on earthquakes and hurricanes. People of this kind say they bear no malice; that their passion is soon over; that they do not "let the sun go down on their wrath;" but the mischief is that if one storm ends at nightfall, another is sure to begin at sunrise. This is hardly fulfilling the apostolic precept. As anger is sinful when it is without a cause, it is also sinful when too prolonged. God never meant us to "nurse our wrath." Severe remedies become dangerous when their action is not almost instantaneous. Prolonged anger is a torment instead of a chastisement to those who have to endure it; however just in its origin, it is resented as a wrong; and hinders, instead of encouraging, penitence.

An angry man little knows the misery and injury he inflicts on those whom, perhaps, he truly loves. His wife and children are in continual fear. His violent language is not forgotten by others as easily as he forgets it himself. No bursts of "good-nature," no lavish gifts, atone for it. Very often his temper leads to habits of concealment and deceit on the part of those with whom he lives. For this he is largely responsible. If he has to do with public business, he drives away from every institution with which he is connected the quiet men who hate strife, and he makes the work of those who remain a constant source of intolerance and disgust. If the charity which "beareth all things" is the queen of the Christian graces, the passion that bears nothing is one of the worst of unchristian vices.

But bad temper will never be conquered till it is felt to be a sin—a sin which every Christian man is bound to repent of and to forsake. It is not difficult to persuade people to acknowledge this in general terms, but the acknowledgment is vitiated by excuses which show that the guilt is not honestly recognized. No man ever thinks of defending himself against the charge of dishonesty, or of falsehood, by pleading that his proneness to the sin diminishes his responsibility; but proneness to violent and ungovernable anger is constantly urged as a palliation of the offence. It is one of the most mischievous characteristics of this sin that it almost always claims to be the necessary result of peculiarity of temperament. I have not unfrequently heard men speak of it as though it were a mere physical infirmity; and as though we had no more right to blame a man for his temper, than for the colour of his eyes, his complexion, or his hair. So long as this excuse is admitted, conscience is silenced, and there can be no vigorous attempt to reform.

No doubt a man's physical constitution has very much to do with his temper. There are people to whom it is no great credit to be gentle and kind. They are kept from violent passion, not by the strength of right principle, but by the sluggishness and weakness of their pulse. But it is the business of man's reason and conscience to tame the waywardness of animal impulses, and to compel them to serve the soul. If temperament is to be an excuse for careless and excessive anger, the glutton and the drunkard may appeal to their physical constitution as an alleviation of their guilt, and many of the fondest offences may take shelter under the same convenient plea. Even the moralist refuses to admit that the soul has any right to excuse its wrong-doing by alleging the strength of the lower passions; it is the soul's darkest curse as well as its deepest degradation, to be unable to control them. The Christian who supposes that there are sins which the Holy Ghost cannot enable him to subdue, disonour "the exceeding greatness of that power," which worketh in all that believe. There is no sin for which Christ atoned, from which He cannot deliver us. There is no sin which He can pardon which He cannot give us strength to overcome. If there were fetters He could not break, diseases He could not heal, our trust in Him as our Saviour would be gone.

Let men consider what they are saying when they imply that a bad temper cannot be overcome. It is not an isolated evil, a mere local affection which leaves the rest of the soul uninjured. By it we are often betrayed into words and deeds most cruel and unjust; by yielding to it, we inflict undeserved misery; it violates the laws of charity; it hinders communion with God; it often destroys our religious usefulness.

Nor should the angry man forget that the very "temperament" which occasions his sin, and which he sometimes pleads in alleviation of his guilt, renders possible forms of excellence which are unattainable by men whose blood is sluggish, and in whose souls no fire burns. Many of the very noblest men that ever lived, had slumbering volcanoes in them. The heat and impulse and vehemence which when uncontrolled hurried us into harsh and unmeasured and violent language, become, when controlled, an element of invaluable power. Rapture in worship, zeal in Christian work, ardour in friendship, enthusiastic loyalty to a just and righteous cause—these are all possible to men whose passions are impetuous. There is hardly any other sin which lies so near to great virtues. Let anger be mastered, and there is not only a great evil escaped; but the same force which wrought the former mischief, gives inspiration and nobleness to the whole moral life.

THE DIFFERENCE OF LONGITUDE BETWEEN AMERICA AND ENGLAND.—The problem of ascertaining the exact difference of longitude between America and England, which has long engaged the attention of scientific men; has just been solved by the officers of the United States Coast Survey, under the personal supervision of Dr. Gould of Cambridge. The Atlantic Telegraph was employed in recording the observations. Early in September last, Dr. Gould and his assistants sailed for Valparaiso bay, leaving Mr. Dean in charge at Heart's Content. A cock-pier and transit-block, and a rude observatory, were erected close to the telegraph building at Valparaiso, and after the preliminary observations for some time and position, the astronomers were left to wait their patiently until chance should give a night clear on both sides of the Atlantic. This occurred on the 25th of October, and precisely at midnight (Greenwich time) the first signals were exchanged, the two observers, on the opposite sides of the ocean, with the eye at the instrument and the observing key, connected with the cable, in the hand, being enabled by telegraphic communication to record their observations at a distance of nearly 2000 miles. These exchanges went on successfully for five nights, and the difference of longitude between the two stations, or, in other words, between the extreme points of the Atlantic Cable, was ascertained to be 2h. 51m. 56.5s.

FARM AND GARDEN.

As the season is advancing, keep your plows moving at all times when the state of the ground permits—breaking up your hands close and deep. The benefits of deep plowing, especially on stiff soils, in our hot dry climate are incalculable. We do not mean bringing the clay to any extent to the surface, but a thorough sub-soiling, so as to enable the rain which falls, to be fully absorbed—sinking below the surface, to be there retained, instead of running off, and bearing with it all the surface soil. Even thorough sub-soiling all our corn lands immediately under the row, which adds but little to the cost of preparation will greatly increase the crop. Where a sub-soil plow is not at hand, a long sharp rooster running deeply into the furrow, after the turning or shovel plow, will do very well. We have one made with just the curve of the cutting edge of a Brinly plow—a narrow twister on an iron stock that answers the purpose admirably, so that the bill, when planted, will be a little below the general surface—with such manure as you can get, scattered around or over the bill, and gradually worked in as you "work" your crop, you can hardly fail of a good and bountiful return for your labor. Recollect: "The best half of the work is done, when a crop is well planted." Before planting, it is well to soak the seed of corn—in selecting which, proper care must be used—in water overnight. In the morning, pour it off, and pour on water as hot as you can bear your hand, just enough to cover the seed. And a little tar, and stir it together, adding more as needed, until, in the process of stirring, a thin coat is left on every grain. Then drain off all the water, and stir in enough of plaster, ashes or super-phosphate to coat every grain, and prevent its sticking to the hands. This will prevent the corn from being pulled by crows, etc. If dry corn is coated with tar, it will retard or prevent its coming up.

Be sure to plow deep!—then use all the manure you can get—we care not how you apply it, either under or over the corn; anywhere, so that the roots can feed on it most readily, (and it unquestionably decomposes soonest at or near the surface.)—and, finally, keep the surface free from weeds, constantly stirred, and break no roots in working your crop. Plant your crop so as to avoid late spring frosts, and you have, in brief, the whole secret of corn growing in this climate.

COTTON.—Remember there is a tax still upon cotton, while all other agricultural products, except sugar, are untaxed. It is, folly, therefore, to run mad upon cotton—cultivating that to the exclusion of food crops, and then find in autumn, all the net proceeds required to pay bills for corn and meat, that should have been produced at home. After the plantation has produced all the forage and provisions required to sustain it, then make and sell all the cotton you can. The most successful growers of 1866, in planting twenty years, has never brought a pound of bacon. But as market products, if there was no draw-back in taxation, rendering a return of profit precarious, there are no crops like cotton and sugar. If the weed and seed is returned to the soil as it should be, if an acre produces a bale of 400 pounds, there is only a trifle more than 4 lbs. phosphates and other necessary salts removed from the soil; while the Northern farmer, who sells from the same area, a ton of hay, sells over a hundred weight of these nutritious salts. Both sugar and lint cotton are almost entirely pure carbons, and their constituents are chiefly derived from the atmosphere. If the soil is kept from washing and is rich to start with, and all its products, except cotton, consumed on the farm, and the manure made returned to the soil a very little outlay yearly for commercial manures, will render the plantation richer every year. So of sugar.

For cotton, as well as corn, the preparation should be deep and thorough, and the crop should be manured as far as possible with compost or commercial manures. The lot manure should, ere this, have been hauled out and turned under. Budding with a turning plow is the best preparation for receiving the seed. The bed need not be high, unless where the ground is inclined to be wet. Do not be in a hurry to plant, while the ground continues cold, and on no account plant over half as much to the hand as was safe to do in the old time. "Plant cotton, but remember that roasting ears are not to be despised; that a few bushels of wheat at home, without sending to Cincinnati to get them, and then sending to the depot day after day to see if they have arrived, are a great contribution to comfort."

SWEET POTATOES.—A deep, rich sandy loam is the best land for the potato. If the soil is clay, it must be too rich, but the deeper the better. To prepare the land sometime in February, select a time when the land is in good condition for working, and lay off the rows four feet wide, with a scooter plow, as deep as two mules can pull it; run a furrow on each side of this centre furrow, with a scooter or half-shovel, and break out the middles with the best cast two-horse plow, breaking the land as deeply and thoroughly as possible, leaving moderately high, well-rounded beds, with deep water-furrows. Watch the small potatoes bedded out, and as soon as the eyes are well-sprouted, (not long enough to endanger being broken off in handling,) take them up, and cut them as you would Irish potatoes, leaving several sprouts to each piece. In the meantime, reverse the beds previously made, running three furrows with the scooter, in the water furrow; and throwing the beds on these three furrows, with turn-plow, drawn by two horses. Let the bed be as deeply plowed as possible, rather flat on top, or gently rounded, but not too high, or sharp, or smoothed with the hoe. Now open the beds with scooter plow, or other implement, and drop the cut potatoes with cut side down, about 15 inches apart and cover with hoe. Plant about $\frac{1}{4}$ or $\frac{1}{2}$ of your crop in this way, and you will get a good stand, be secure of good yield, and from every row can draw slips to plant out three more rows, leaving one in the planted row.

You can at this time, if you wish, reverse all the land previously prepared, throwing it back as you need it, always planting on clean, fresh broken land. It will be very well, however, to let it stand until the slips on the bed are ready to set out, when you must run two or three scooter furrows in the water furrow, and bed on them, making a bed deeply broken, well pulverized, rather flat on top, and rough as the plow leaves it and not smoothed, and draw up high and sharp with the hoe. After the first shower, draw the slips carefully from the bed, take a rod of hard wood, smoothly sharpened at one end, 4 or 5 feet long, and make in a line, in the centre of the bed, holes 15 inches apart, drop a slip at each hole, insert the slips nearly to the buds, and press the earth carefully around the roots, as well as near the top of the plant. At the next rain, have in readiness another part of your land, and proceed in the same way, (if the slips are ready) trying to put in the main part of your patch by middle of May, and finishing by middle of June. (I forgot to say before making the holes in the beds, level them on top by striking the hoe lightly in the direction of their length.)—Southern Cultivator.

NOVEL MODE OF MANAGING A RESISTIVE HORSE.—On Saturday last a groom mounted on a high-spirited, bunter, entered the High street of Coldstream, and, when opposite Sir John Majoribank's monument, the horse began to plunge and rear to a fearful extent, swerving to the right and then to the left, but go forward he would not, nor could all the exertions of the groom overcome his obstinacy. The street was filled with people expecting to see the animal destroy himself on the spikes of the iron railing around the monument, when Mr. McDougal, saddler, walked up to the groom and said: "I think, my man, you are not taking a proper method to make the horse go; allow me, if you please, to show you a trick worth knowing."

"Well," says the groom, "if you can make him go it's more than I can," when Mr. McDougal took a piece of whipcord, which he tied with a firm knot on one of the animal's ears, which he bent gently down, fastened the end of the string to the check buckle of the bridle, which done, he patted the horse's neck once or twice, and said, "Now let me see you go quietly home like a good horse;" and, astonishing to relate, it moved off as gently as if nothing had happened. Mr. McDougal says he has seen, in London, horses which no manner of force could make go, while this mild treatment was always successful. — Kilno Chronicle.

"Madam," said a husband to his young wife, in a little altercation, which will spring up in the best regulated families, "when a man and his wife have quarreled, and each considers the other at fault, which of the two ought to advance toward a reconciliation?" "The best natured and wisest of the two," said the wife, putting up her mouth for a kiss, which was given with an unctious. She was the conqueror.

A MARK OF FAITH.—Among many marks that we are on this journey and under sail toward heaven, this is one, when the love of God so filleth our hearts that we forget to love, and care too much for the having or waiting of other things; as our extreme heat burneth out another.—Manna Crumbs.

Many saints have had their hearts warmed and kindled by sitting near other saints' fires.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

JELLY PIE.—Two cups of sugar, one of butter, one of jelly, beat seven eggs and mix well together; bake on pastry.

MOLASSES PIE.—Beat, well, and separately the whites and yolks of four eggs, one teaspoon of brown sugar, two tablespoonfuls of butter, beat well together, stir in a teaspoon and a half of molasses, then add the yolks, then the whites, add half a nutmeg, and bake in a pastry. This will make two large pies.

CHEESE CAKE.—One cup of butter, two cups of sugar, the yolks of nine eggs, beat well, then add the butter and sugar, flavor with brandy or lemon; bake in pastry.

LEMON PIE.—Grate the rinds of three lemons, and squeeze the juice. On the gratings, six eggs beat separately, add to the yolks half pound of sugar and a teaspoon of butter well beaten together, a tablespoonful of brandy, then add the lemon, then the whites, then thoroughly beat all; bake in a pastry.

CUP CAKE.—Two cups of sugar, one of butter, one of sweet milk, five of flour, two teaspoonfuls of yeast powder, eight eggs. This will make a large cake.

SPRING HILL CAKE.—(Delicious.)—One cup of butter, two of fine white sugar, rubbed together, three of flour and one of pearl starch sifted, one of sweet milk; into it put half a teaspoonful of soda and one of cream of tartar, the white of six eggs.

SILVER CAKE.—One cup of butter, three of sugar, one and a half of sweet milk, the white of one dozen eggs, five cups of flour and two teaspoonfuls of yeast powder. This will make a large cake.

THE QUEEN OF PUDDINGS.—Take one pint of nice bread crumbs, add one quart of milk, one cup of sugar, the yolks of four eggs, well beaten, the rind of a fresh lemon, grated fine, a piece of butter the size of an egg; then bake until well done. Now beat the whites of the four eggs to a stiff froth, adding a teaspoonful of powdered sugar in which has previously been stirred the juice of the lemon. Spread over the pudding a layer of jelly (any kind to the taste,) then pour the whites of the eggs over and place in the oven until lightly browned. Serve with cold cream. It is the richest pudding known to the science of cookery.

SPICE CAKE.—Take one and a half cups of butter, three cups of sugar, one cup of milk, five cups of flour, five eggs, one teaspoonful powdered cinnamon, one teaspoonful cloves, one teaspoonful allspice, one teaspoonful nutmeg, one teaspoonful soda, and one pound stoned raisins. Beat the eggs, sugar and milk together, then add the other articles, and prepare for the oven.

WHITE CUP CAKE.—Take one cup of butter, two cups of powdered sugar, four cups of flour, five eggs, one cup of milk or sour cream (sufficient soda to sweeten,) one nutmeg, one teaspoonful powdered cinnamon. Beat the eggs, sugar, and butter (previously softened by heat) together, then add the other articles. Bake in small tins or cups.

FRUIT CAKE.—Take one cup of butter, one cup of brown sugar, one of molasses, one of sweet milk, three of flour, five eggs, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, two pounds of raisins, one pound of currants, one teaspoonful ground cloves, one teaspoonful ground allspice, one teaspoonful ground cinnamon, one ground nutmeg, and a half a wine glass of brandy. Bake in a carefully heated oven.

TOMATO CATSUP.—Take any quantity of tomatoes—they should be fully ripe—wash them and cut them in slices and boil them until very soft, then put them through a sieve to take out the seeds and skins. Then place them over the fire again to boil. Now add salt, pepper, mace and spices to suit the taste, and boil away to nearly one-half; then set aside to cool, and when cold bottle for use.

TO REMOVE INK SPOTS AND IRON MOULD.—Take a small quantity of oxalic acid, and dissolve in as little water as possible. Wash the stain first with pure water, taking care to use no soap. Then apply the acid solution until the stain is removed, when the article should again be washed in clean water.

BROWN BREAD.—Take two cups of corn meal, one cup of wheat flour, one cup of rye flour, one cup of molasses, three cups of sweet milk, one teaspoonful of soda. Put in a pudding boiler and steam for five hours.

TO ADVERTISERS.

This paper has for many years been well known in this community as the very best advertising medium by which the business men of the city could bring their merchandise, trades, professions, and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood when it is remembered that the four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States in the Rio Grand, East Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all, more or less active agents for the paper; and when it is also remembered that our paper circulates among a large class of people who seldom see any other New Orleans paper.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order. We have reason to believe that of all the monies forwarded to us by mail but a very small amount has failed to reach us: whenever the letters have been registered.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL COLLECTING CARDS.—An abundant supply of the Sunday-School Collecting Card designed by Rev. W. E. M. Linfield and so successfully used in Natchez, and other places, in collecting funds for Sunday-School purposes, is on sale at the Branch Southern M. E. Publishing House, 112 Camp street, in this city, with instructions for using them printed on the back of each. Sold in packs of 100, at $1 per pack. Sent by mail at $1 25 per pack. Address R. H. HARR, Agent.

A DISTRICT MEETING of all the ministers and official members of the New Orleans District will be held on the fourth Saturday and Sunday in April in the Carondelet street Church in this city. We hope that all of our brethren from each appointment, or as many as possible, will be present. There will be at the same time a Monthly meeting of the Stewards. All in attendance will be entertained, as usual at our Conferences.

THE HOUR.

It is clearly manifest as the motion of the sun in the sky, that we are in the midst of a great revolution. We have already gone round more than ninety degrees of the political circle since 1860, and the course of the revolution was never more rapid or irresistible than now. New York Christian Advocate, Feb. 28, 1867. A clear statement of a great fact. The writer says further, "we have never suffered shipwreck nor experienced the terrors of an earthquake; but it has seemed to us that this state of uncertainty in public affairs is not altogether unlike them." It is well to know that some of the more influential, and reflecting men in the radical party of the North realize their own situation. They feel the ground moving beneath them. They see the constitution of the government giving way steadily before the pressure of forces which did not take their rise in the recent war, but which still threaten the republic with unspent fury. These forces have never at any time been under control since the period immediately preceding the Kansas war. The War of the States was, upon the part of the South, an effort to resist, and upon the part of the North, an effort to guide the whirlwind. In our opinion each failed. Whatever was accomplished by the North cannot be described as the result of well-matured counsel, or wise intention guiding the course of the conflict to any end beyond that of the hour's necessity. If there be any wisdom or excellence in Emancipation, neither of the parties can take any credit for its accomplishment. On both sides it was adopted, by the one as a "war measure," by the other as a military necessity. In fact, New England would have been as urgent for gradual emancipation as Georgia could possibly be, if the times would have permitted political consultation. If there was, on the other hand, a violent interference with the rights of individuals and established constitutional processes of law, the necessities of the occasion were pleaded as mightier than the writ of the Chief Justice, by those who professed a profound respect for the constitution itself.

All this demonstrates that parties and individuals throughout the North had raised a demon which their combined art has not yet been able to lay. The war is over, but the "course of the revolution" still goes on. The determination to assume that in the South the war is not over, cannot change the truth. This may be affirmed as an apology for the high legislation of Congress; but the fact remains that from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, there has not been a single act of resistance to the United States Government since the surrender. Even the "New Orleans Riot" was for the maintenance of the constituted authority of the government, not against it. Peace has never been profounder in its reign, than during the past two years over the nine millions of the Southern States.

It is immediately upon the surrender. Even the pot continues boiling for a little while after the fire is removed; but the South became quiet at once. There have been as few deaths, from all causes, in proportion to the population as in the Northern States. If then the "course of the revolution" was never more rapid," its motive power must be sought for outside of the South. There is nothing here but ruined credit, broken levees, devastated fields, solitary chimneys, widows, orphans, and a people steeped in every thing but honor, and a just self-respect. We had no interest but to accept in good faith the amnesty proposed by the President at the close of the war, and did so accept it. The occasion and ground therefore of any more revolutionizing must be sought for elsewhere than here. The accusation is absurd, and as open to suspicion as the one, that the lamb did muddy the water by drinking from the stream below. Neither the political nor the social condition of the South require any more revolutions just at present. If these things be therefore conducted for our good, we must beg the philanthropists to consider and desist. Our people need but two things, quiet and corn. They will not be able to afford the luxury of revolutionizing any more during the life-time, probably, of their youngest children. Whatever is done in this way must be carried on by those who have heretofore made a better thing of it, than the South has.

Neither could it bring anything to the happiness of the freedman. He has full as much command of himself as he can manage. He respects his old friends and is respected by them. His labor is in demand. He eats as much as any other laborer in the world; his wife has as much leisure, and his children are as healthy as he could desire. Reading, writing, and cyphering have already ceased to be to him a novelty worth more than it costs. He cannot be forced into hostility to his old master, for he yet prefers him, in the main, to any other employer, and the privileges of his new political condition, scarcely add a single "thunder and lightning waistcoat" to his wardrobe.

Whatever Northern politicians in the churches, or in Congress, may contemplate, they will reap full as much of their own legislation as we shall at this end of the country. The principles involved in their legislative acts become of universal force however much they may think to limit them. The fortunes of a people with whom they affiliate will soon be their own. Speaking the same language, springing from the same ancestral sources, and identified commercially, socially, religiously, boasting of the same battlefields, habitually residing equally everywhere north, south, east, west, the whole population in a continual flux of internal migration, all the laws that were ever formed cannot confine misery, misrule, disfranchisement, confiscation, or military law to one spot. If Northern people should cease to have anything to do with Southern commercially, religiously, and socially, so long as they make laws they will be effected by the laws they make. The reflex action of the Military Bill is felt in New York full as much as the direct action is felt in New Orleans. "The terrors of an earthquake" is a very accurate expression for "the uncertainty of public affairs" just now, as felt in the South; but it defines the emotions of one of the foremost Republicans in the Northern Methodist Church, a "Pharisee of the Pharisees." It tells the workings of a Radical mind upon discovering that we are all at sea in the same boat. It is a very poor comfort to know that the leak is in but one end of it; that there is a sort of partition in the middle. The Radical has cool sense enough to see that if one end sinks the whole concern is in danger. The law he frames for the benefit of Rebel consins, brothers, and nephews, in a time of profound peace, may possibly be communicated, at no distant day, to his own lips by an opposition party at home, equally jealous for Constitutional liberty, and not less mindful of precedent. The turn of the wheel of power is as variable in republics as that of fortune.

Indeed it is the fear of such a change that urges the party now in power to brave these constitutional difficulties; and proceed upon a course which it feels to be one of "shipwreck" and "earthquake." It is a violent effort to postpone an inevitable doom. To admit Southern representatives fairly in Congress would be to consent to the existence of a party more powerful than itself, i. e., the union of the Northern Opposition with the Southern Delegates. How far the Military Bill may ultimately defeat the very power that created it will be seen in subsequent Northern elections. It was this hazardous dilemma, on the one hand a violent legislative precedent, on the other a powerful political combination that makes the clear-sighted Radical feel as if walking on earthquakes. He feels that a "revolution" is going forward because he is himself sacrificing his most valued constitutional rights for the present position. But the spirit of "revolution" drives him on: he is the victim of his own storm.

How to escape this perilous fury is the question. Misery may love company, but is a poor companion. It affords one no consolation to share the fate of a madman, though it may be evident that he is the victim merely of disease. When one knows not what to do it is true wisdom to do nothing. Do nothing, say nothing, only raise corn: this is the sum. In all this strife of elements our refuge is "The Lord reigneth." The man of true faith can afford to be calm. The very confusion and "terrors" evident in the language we have quoted, suggests even to a weak faith, that when men in high position know not where they are going, it is possible for God to over rule, and control the fortunes of the hour.

Respect for the great principles of law, and of right as embodied in the Constitution, is certainly the basis and strength of this Republic. A republican form of government can only exist by such respect. This is its essential difference from a despotism which is a government of sheer force. Any legislation which shows a want of this respect, weakens the government. Every right enumerated, if not every law, in the written instrument of the Constitution is the embodiment, not of the wisdom of the English race, but of its history—the history of its various struggles in the great experimental work of human government, the results of hundreds of battles of conflicting interests, ideas, and sentiments. The wars of many generations are in its words. Allowing that certain issues have been made by great champions, and certain victories won, men do not care to make them over again. To cast away the cords of the Constitution is, then, "revolution indeed." To violate the habeas corpus, the prohibition of attainder, the right of representation, is to destroy the accumulated wealth of five hundred years. The Southern people have, as they believe, ever held and do hold the principles of the written constitution as sacred. They have exhausted every resource in its maintenance—If they were willing to sacrifice the Union, it was in order to save the Constitution. And it may one day appear, that the stupendous war through which all the States have just passed, has greatly enhanced the sacredness of the Constitution, while it has successfully maintained the Union.

"RENEWING THE COVENANT."—We wish that all our readers may draw inspiration from the spiritual breathings of the church in Mobile. In this season of worldly disturbance it refreshes the soul to know that in Christ there is peace; to believe that there are holy men and women who feel that "the kingdom, the power, and the glory" of the universe truly belong unto God.

The "HOME MONTHLY."—The March number is before us, decidedly the best yet produced by the Editors. They request us to say that they will send the Monthly without charge to those members of the several Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, who will agree to act as agents. They state that their intention is to make it a church publication. The families of our people will find it a great improvement upon those silly periodicals, too frequently found upon their centre tables, which serve up a monthly dish of sentimental horrors, agonizing heroes, and languishing heroines arriving, through many "continuations," and hairbreadth chances at a small cottage Price $3. Address Messrs. STARK & HILL, Nashville, Tennessee.

We have received from the Leonard Scott Publishing Company the American reprint of the Westminster Review for January, 1867. Its contents are of their usual interest. They are: The battle of Sadwa, and Military Organization; the Ethics of Aristotle; the Ladies' Petition; Winckelmann; Irish University Education; Edmund Spenser; Social Reform in England; Reform and Reformers; Contemporary Literature.

SUMMERVILLE FEMALE COLLEGE, TENNESSEE.—A letter from Dr. R. H. Rivers the President states that there are nearly 100 pupils in attendance upon this flourishing Institution. It is situated forty miles East of Memphis. It is thoroughly organized and fully equipped for educating a large number of students. It is connected with Memphis by Rail Road. We can most heartily commend it to the patronage of our Louisiana friends.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

We have the following item of cheering news from North Post, Mobile Conference, date Feb. 28: "Our first Quarterly Meeting on this (North Post Circuit,) was held at this place, on the 16th inst. The meeting was protracted until last evening. Bro. Guley, the Presiding Elder remained and labored for us until the 19th. Eleven professions and reclamations, and twelve accessions to the church. The church was considerably revived, and I hope, impressions made upon sinners that will be lasting. Thirteen penitents were left at the altar, most of whom express themselves determined to preserve under any and all discouragements until they obtain the pearl of great price. The Lord be praised for his goodness. Oh pray for us, much has been done, but much remains that ought to be done.

Your Bro. in Christ,
E. M. TURNER.

CITY NEWS.

DOLBEAR COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, NEW ORLEANS, March 4, 1867.
GEN. D. H. MAURY,
Secretary S. H. Association, present:
General.—At the request of the Committees of Arrangement and Invitation, and a large number of the audience, our distinguished fellow citizens the Rev. Dr. Palmer and Hon. Chas. Gayarre, will give for publication copies of their most eloquent and statesmanlike addresses, delivered on the 26th ult., at Lyceum Hall, on the occasion of the celebration of the 35th Anniversary of this College. I propose to have 2000 copies of the full proceedings printed, and donate them to the S. H. Association, to be sold at 50 cents per copy.

The fact that out of 3200 invitations sent out, 3000 of the most intellectual of our citizens attended, a large number more than could get admittance, convinces me that our people will feel more interest in reading these beautiful and eloquent addresses than any yellow-back novels, and I feel that I can make no more fitting acknowledgment to our people than to turn the occasion to the relief of the unfortunate of our desolate country. Such a bail-liant audience, in the gayest part of our season, is a sufficient reply to the oft repeated slander that our people are given up to amusement and frivolity; for I have never seen North or South, so handsome an attendance on a similar occasion.

I am, General, most respectfully,
RUFUS DOLBEAR, President.

OFFICE OF S. H. ASSOCIATION, 109 CHATELAIN STREET,
New Orleans, March 6, 1867.

Dear Sir,—I have the pleasure to accept your liberal offer to aid this Association, by publishing and selling, for its benefit, the addresses delivered by the Rev. Dr. Palmer, and the Hon. Mr. Gayarre, before the Dolbear Commercial College. With thanks for the interest you have thus expressed in our success, I remain, very respectfully, Your obt. servt.,

DANIEL H. MAURY,
Sec. S. H. A.

LEGISLATURE OF LOUISIANA.

The Senate on Federal Relations.

Mr. Foute, from the joint committee on federal relations, reported joint resolutions for the appointment of a joint committee to take measures to test the constitutionality of certain acts of Congress. The following is a copy of the resolution: JOINT RESOLUTION relative to federal legislation affecting injuriously the State and people of Louisiana, and providing means of protection and redress against the same, and the acts of any officers or agents of said government, or of any other persons or of any State.

WHEREAS, Much of the legislation of the federal government, and more especially the act entitled, "an act for the more efficient government of the rebel States" is in the opinion of the people of Louisiana unconstitutional, oppressive and injurious to them and to the other States of the South; and, whereas they owe it to themselves and their posterity to oppose all peaceable and legal obstacles to the enforcement within the limits of Louisiana of the said act, and of all the measures of a similar character; therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana, in General Assembly convened, That two senators and three representatives, to be appointed by the president of the Senate and speaker of the House of Representatives, be, and they are hereby, constituted, together with the president of the Senate and the speaker of the House of Representatives, special commissioners with full powers, to them, or any three of them, who may act under these resolutions, at their discretion to employ counsel either within or without the limits of the State, either independently or in conjunction with other persons or States, or the authorities thereof, or both, for the purpose of testing in the name of the State, or otherwise, before any court of competent jurisdiction, either of the United States or of this State, in any manner which may be necessary, or may seem best to said commissioners, or to the counsel by them employed, the constitutionality of the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled, "an act for the more efficient government of the rebel States" and the constitutionality of any other act of said Congress, either supplemental to the act before recited or not, and whether now existing or hereafter to be passed, or the constitutionality or legality of any judgment, or order, or acts of any of the officers or agents of the United States government, or of any State, or person, which in the opinion of said commissioners may affect injuriously the State of Louisiana or any citizen or resident thereof.

Resolved, That the sum of $30,000 (thirty thousand dollars), or as much thereof as may be necessary, be and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any funds unappropriated in the treasury, to defray the expenses, including counsel fees, contemplated by this act, which amount shall be paid on the warrant of said commissioners, or any three of them, at any time they may consider it proper and for the public interest; Provided, It shall be the duty of said commissioners to render an account of their expenditures under this act to the legislature at its next regular session, on the fourth Monday of January, 1868, or thereafter when required.

Resolved, That the president of the Senate and the speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized and required to forward to similar officers and to governors of the other Southern States embraced within the operation of the before recited act, copies of these resolutions, accompanied by a request to said States to co-operate with Louisiana in the measures proposed by these resolutions.

Resolved, That these resolutions shall take effect from and after their passage. By a vote of 26 to 2 it was adopted on the second reading. It is quite certain that the Convention Bill, will be amended by the Legislature so as to bring on the election in September instead of April.

THE MILITARY BILL.

THE MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT—SCORING REVIEW OF THE PROPOSED MEASURE—IT IS IN CONFLICT WITH THE PLAINEST PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION—IT IS A SUBVERSIVE OF THE PRINCIPLES OF OUR FATHERS—IT GIVES ABSOLUTE POWER TO AN IRRESPONSIBLE OFFICER—ALL LAW SUBVERSIVE TO HIS WILL.

The following is the message of the President of the United States, returning to the House of Representatives a bill "entitled an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States."

To the House of Representatives:

I have examined the bill to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States with their care and anxiety, which its transcendent importance is calculated to awaken. I am unable to give it my assent, for reasons so grave that I hope a statement of them may have some influence on the minds of the patriotic and enlightened, with whom the decision must ultimately rest. The bill places all the people of ten States therein named, under the absolute domination of military rulers, and the preamble undertakes to give reasons upon which it is justified. It declares that there exists in those States no legal government and adequate protection to life and property, and asserts the necessity of enforcing peace and good order within their limits.

It is true, as a matter of fact—it is not denied—that the States in question have each of them an actual government, with all the powers, executive, judicial and legislative; which properly belong to a free State; they are organized like the other States of the Union, and like them they make, administer and execute the laws which concern their domestic affairs. An existing de facto government, exercising such functions as these, is itself the law of States upon all matters within its jurisdiction. To pronounce the supreme law making the power of an established State illegal, is to say that law itself is unlawful; and the provisions which these governments made for the preservation of the order, for the suppression of crime and the redress of private injuries, are in substance and principle the same as those which prevail in the Northern States and in other civilized countries. They certainly have not succeeded in preventing the commission of all crime, nor has this been accomplished anywhere in the world. There, as well as elsewhere, offenders sometimes escape for want of vigorous prosecution, and occasionally perhaps by the inefficiency of courts or the prejudice of jurors.

It is undoubtedly true that those evils have much increased and aggravated the North and South, by the demoralizing influence of civil war, and by the rancorous feelings which the contest has engendered; but that those people are maintaining local governments for themselves, which habitually defeat the object of all government, and render their own lives and property insecure, is in itself utterly improbable, and the avowal of the bill to that effect is not supported by any evidence which has come to my knowledge. All the information I have on that subject convinces me that the mass of the Southern people, and those who control their public acts, while they entertain diverse opinions of federal policy, are completely united in the effort to reorganize their society on the basis of peace, and restore mutual prosperity as rapidly, and as completely as their circumstances will permit.

The bill, however, would seem to show upon its face that the establishment of peace and good order is not its real object. The fifth section declares that the preceding sections shall cease to operate in any State where certain events have happened. These are:

1st. The selection of delegates to a State convention by election, at which negroes shall be allowed to vote.
2d. The formation of a State Constitution by the convention so chosen.
3d. The insertion into the State Constitution of a provision which will secure the right of voting at all elections to negroes and such white men as may not be disfranchised for rebellion.
4th. The submission of the Constitution for ratification to negroes and white men not disfranchised, and its actual ratification by the vote.

5th. The submission of the State Constitution to Congress for examination and actual approval of it by that body.

6th. The adoption of certain amendments to the federal Constitution by the vote of the legislature elected under the new Constitution.

7th. The adoption of said amendments by a sufficient number of other States to make it a part of the Constitution of the United States.

All of these conditions must be fulfilled before the people of any of these States can be relieved from the bondage of military domination; but when they are fulfilled, then the pains and penalties of the bill are to cease, no matter whether there be peace and order or not, without reference to the security of life and property. The excuse given for the preamble is admitted by the bill itself not to be real. The military rule which it establishes is plainly to be used not for any purpose of order and for the prevention of crime, but solely as a means of coercing the people into the adoption of principles and measures to which it is known they are opposed, and upon which they have an undeniable right to exercise their own judgment.

I submit to Congress whether this measure is not, in its whole scope and object, without precedent and without authority, and in palpable conflict with the plainest provisions of the Constitution, and utterly destructive to those great principles of liberty and humanity for which our ancestors on both sides of the Atlantic shed so much blood and expended so much treasure.

The ten States named in the bill are divided in five districts, and for each district an officer of the army, not below the rank of brigadier general, is to be appointed to rule over the people, and he is to be supported with an effective militia force to enable him to perform his duties, and the authorities, as defined by the third section of the bill, are to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress disorder and violence, and to punish or cause to be punished all disturbers of the public peace or criminals.

The power thus given to the commanding officer over all the people of each State is that of an absolute monarch. His mere will is to take the place of all the law of the States, and is the only rule applicable to the subject placed under his control, and that is completely displaced by the clause which declares all interference of the State authority to be null and void. He alone is permitted to determine what are the rights of person and property. He may protect them in such way as in his discretion may seem proper, and places at his free disposal, all the lands and goods in his district. He may distribute them without let or hindrance to whom he pleases, being bound by no State law; and there being no other law to regulate the subject, he may make a criminal code of his own, and he can make it as bloody as any recorded in history, or he can reserve the privilege of acting upon the impulse of his private passions in each case that arises.

He is bound by no rules of evidence. There is indeed no provision by which he is authorized or required to take evidence at all. Everything is a crime which he chooses to call so, and all persons are condemned whom he pronounces guilty. He is not bound to make any report or keep any record of his proceedings. He may arrest his victims, wherever he may find them, without accusation or proof of probable cause. If he gives them a trial before he inflicts the punishment, he gives of his grace and mercy, not because he is commanded so to do. To a casual reader of the bill it might seem that some kind of a trial was secured to persons accused of crime; but such is not the case. The officer may locate civil tribunals to try offenders, but of course this does not require that he shall do so.

If any State or federal court presumes to exercise its legal jurisdiction by the trial of a malefactor, without his special permission, he can break it up and punish the judges and jurors as being themselves malefactors. He can save his friends from justice and despoil his enemies, contrary to justice. It is also provided that he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals, but this power is not commanded. To do it is merely permissive, and is to be used only when, in his judgment, it may be necessary for the trial of offenders. Even if the sentence of a commission were made a prerequisite to the punishment of a party, it would scarcely be the slightest restraint upon the officer, who has authority to organize it as he pleases, prescribes its mode of proceedings, appoints its members from his own subordinates, and reverses all its decisions.

Instead of mitigating the harshness of this single bill, such tribunals would be used more probably to divide the responsibility of making it more cruel or unjust. Several provisions dictated by the humanity of Congress have been inserted in the bill apparently to restrain power of the commanding officer, but it seems to me that they are of no avail for that purpose.

The fourth section provides 1st, That trial shall not be unnecessarily delayed, but I think I have shown that the power is given to punish without trial, and if so, this provision is practically inoperative. Cruel or annual punishment is not to be inflicted. But who is to decide what is cruel? and usually the words have acquired a legal meaning by long use in the courts. Can it be expected that military officers will understand it and follow a rule so purely technical, and not pertaining in the least degree to their profession? If not, then such officer may define cruelty according to his own temper, and if not usual, he will make it usual corporal punishment; the gags, the ball and chain and other almost insupportable forms of torture invented for military punishment, would be within the range of choice.

LATEST NEWS.

WASHINGTON, March 12.—The President, to-day, having heard from Gen. Grant, Gen. Sherman, Gen. Hancock and other military officers with whom he consulted as to the appointment of commanders of the five Southern divisions, decided upon the selections to be made, and an order will be issued to-morrow.

The order assigns Schofield to the first division, Sickles to the second, Thomas to the third, Ord to the fourth, and Sheridan to the fifth. No instructions will accompany the order, which is a simple plain assignment to the several divisions with copy of the law attached.

Instructions will be hereafter issued, as necessity shall suggest. It is barely possible that there may hereafter be some changes made in these commands, and the appointment of Gen. Thomas to the first district may require a new appointment for his department, for so much as embraces the States of Tennessee and Kentucky.

WASHINGTON, March 13.—In the House of Representatives to-day, Fernando Wood, of New York, opposed the bill for the appropriation of one million of dollars for the relief of destitution in the South, on the ground that there was no real necessity for such a grant as this, and that what was actually wanted was peace, quietness, security under the Constitution and the laws, as these had been transmitted by our forefathers.

Williams thought that congressional bounty would be better applied to widows and orphans made so by rebels. If any were to suffer, let it be the disloyal.

Chandler denounced the measure as intended to bolster up the freedmen's bureau. It was a "wolf in sheep's clothing."

CAIRO, March 13.—The levee at Mound City broke this morning. The citizens tried to stop the crevasse by sinking a boat, but without avail. The town is completely inundated. No lives lost. The Cairo levee is intact.

NEW YORK, March 13.—The National Democratic committee, recommending thorough organization, disapproves of a national convention previous to that for nomination next year.

The New Hampshire elections gave the radicals 3000 majority.

The delegation from the legislature of Virginia, on the subject of the military bill had an interview with the President to-day.

The result was that Mr. Johnson reiterated the sentiments which he is said to have proclaimed during the past few days, that the best course to be pursued is that of acquiescing in the action of Congress wherever its power is paramount.

It is stated that Chief Justice Chase has shown his character and feelings by declaring that he will make no Louisiana appointments under the bankruptcy bill unless on the recommendation of Mike Hahn.

HERO-WORSHIP.

Thomas Carlyle, one of the most vigorous and influential of living writers, systematically advocates, and practically illustrates a theory of Hero-worship which is, at best, exceedingly pernicious. According to this theory, the hero is not the pure disciple of truth, nor the defender of a righteous cause; but the man of iron will, of power, of good fortune. Success, even though attained by the violation of every principle of justice and liberty, is the criterion of merit. The successful man is the hero before whom we ought to prostrate ourselves in adoration, and whose career we would do well to imitate.

Nor is Carlyle alone in this. In perhaps the majority of instances, the biographer becomes the blinded admirer and special pleader of his subject. Personal vices and public crimes, that ought to be unparalytically condemned, are palliated, either by a suppression of facts, or by an artful misuse of them. Thus every monster of successful iniquity has had his admiring apologist. Tarquinius Superbus, overthrowing by violence and terrible cruelties the liberties of Rome, finds an enthusiastic eulogist in the accomplished Montesquieu; Richard III., whose villainies deserve nothing but execration, finds a vindicator in Lord Orford. And what but the triumph of Caesar has saved him from a fate like that of Cataline, and exalted him as a hero with whom sovereigns have ever since been proud to be compared?

Now, in consideration of the influence of biography upon the moral sentiments, principles, and purpose of the young, the evils of this theory cannot be sufficiently deprecated. The development and discipline of the intellectual faculties attained in school, valuable as they are, constitute by no means the whole of education. The purposes are of supreme importance, for they are the springs of action and the authors of character. But these are not gained from arithmetic, nor found in grammar; they are gathered from various sources—from the instructions of the family circle, from the Sunday-school, from society, from general reading, and especially from biography. The influence of the last is silent indeed, but impressive, powerful, permanent. Lord Brougham, in one of his noblest speeches, points out the vital relations which history and biography sustain to a nation's youth, and hence to a nation's subsequent ideas, growth, welfare, glory. And after indicating the evils which the world has suffered from the practice of presenting such partial pictures of the "Great," falsely so called, as can serve only to allure to an unscrupulous ambition, he inculcates upon educators the duty of finding models of heroism in men like our own Washington, and of inspiring the young with admiration for the truly virtuous and good. These are the views of a statesman and philanthropist; and they are worthy of serious consideration.—Educational Monthly.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

To the Members of the Mississippi Conference.

DEAR BRETHREN: The minutes of our last session are now ready for delivery. They were very handsomely gotten up at Nashville, at a cost of about $175.00, including express, etc., for 2000 copies. We failed to get advertisements to pay for the printing, and will therefore have to call on the Presiding Elders, according to instructions at Conference. We have written to each of the Presiding Elders, and hope this additional notice will spur them up to promptly remit their proportion of the above amount.

NEW SOUTHERN MUSIC BOOK.

Just published

TABOR;

Or the Richmond Collection of Sacred Music.

By R. MCINTOSH, of Virginia.

The attention of Choirs and Musical Societies generally is respectfully asked for this new and popular collection of Church Music. Its author, for four years an officer in the Confederate Army, composed many pieces in moments snatched during his marches and counter-marches. The dirge at the funeral of Gen. T. J. Jackson (Stone-wall) May 17, 1863, was from his pen, and is included in this collection.
Says the Richmond Whig: "The writer is well known throughout the South as an author of Sacred excellence; a musical reputation rarely attained—at the head of Church Music; no one disputing the position with him, and besides is, and ever has been, one of us."
Says the Spartanburg (S. C.) Express: "After a careful examination of Tabor, we have no hesitation in pronouncing it a Musical Gem. Its original compositions give the work a distinctive character, while the selections embrace those good old tunes which have come down from our fathers as an invaluable legacy. Here, also, may be found a number of traditional melodies, which, for half a century or more, have been sung throughout the South and Southwest, and never before in print. We can heartily recommend it to Churches, Choirs, and all lovers of Sacred Music."

It has been largely introduced and highly recommended by many of the Churches in Richmond and Petersburg, where the author is best known. It embraces all the metres in use in every key and variety of measure, with a full elementary department and fine collection of new anthems, set pieces, and sentences. It contains nearly 300 closely printed pages, neatly and tastefully gotten up, well printed and bound.
Price—retail, $1.35; $12.00 per dozen.
Can be obtained through all booksellers, or will be mailed by the Publishers to any of the United States, post free, on receipt of retail price.

POWER OF LITTLES.

Great events, we often find,
On little things depend,
And very small beginnings
Have oft a mighty end.

Letters joined make words,
And words to books may grow,
As a little spark kindled,
Forms an avalanche of snow.

A single utterance may good
Or evil thoughts inspire;
One little spark kindled,
May set a town on fire.

What volumes may be written
With little drops of ink!
How small a leaf, unnoticed,
A mighty ship will sink!

A tiny insect's labor
Makes the coral strand,
And mighty seas are girdled
With grains of golden sand.

A daily penny, saved,
A fortune may begin;
A daily penny, squandered,
May lead to ruin and sin.

Our life is made entirely
Of moments multiplied.
As little streamlets joining,
From the ocean's side.

Our hours and days, our months and years,
Are in small moments given;
They constitute our time below—
Eternity in heaven.

Child's Paper.

Woodpecker.

Is it dry enough for a walk in the woods? Let us go. Hark! Tap, tap, tap! What noise is that? It is the tattoo of the woodpecker. Do you know him? There is one in black, with a red cap on his head; there is another in green; and here is a speckled woodpecker. They differ a little in dress, but all have straight, long, pointed bills—real pickaxes for work. Their feet have two toes behind and two before, good for climbing and holding on to the bark of a tree; besides, their feet are set further back than most birds', you will find. What is woodpecker doing? Chipping away the bark of a tree. Will it not injure the tree? Oh no; for if you examine the bits of bark which have fallen down, you will see it is old bark, which was already old and peeling off. Under this old bark there are ever so many bugs. It is these it is after for its breakfast; so we will not frighten it; it is doing no harm.

Does it build a nest like a robin? No. You never find one on the tree-tops, like robins'; on under the eaves, like swallows'; or in the grass, like bobolinks'. You will laugh to find its nest is a tunnel which it hollows out in a tree—a decayed tree, in whose soft wood it can easily work. The little wife helps her husband, first one and then the other pecking all the time, till their house is finished. Not only all day, but sometimes far into the evening, you can hear them hammering away, like carpenters at their bench. The nest is not a soft, nice, lined nest, like robins'. The bottom of the tunnel is covered with fine chips, and on the top of these the eggs are laid, four, five, or six, snow-white.

One would think such a snug nest was safe from all harm. The wind could not rock it away, if it blew ever so hard; and what robber could find it? A robber does find it. The wren, a fiery little bird, very fond of holes and crannies, sometimes comes, and liking the snug looks of the new nest, fights the poor woodpeckers and drives them off; and the woodpeckers, strange to say, never stand up for their rights, but go and build another elsewhere, not without being much troubled, however, I know. But they have a worse enemy even than the wren. It is the black snake, who lying in wait under the grass, spies the birds as they go in and out; and what does it do at the first chance, but wind up the tree, creep into woodpecker's house, eat up all the little ones, and as if it had not done the meanest and wickedest thing a snake could do, it coils itself up and goes to sleep, as if nothing had happened. Do you not pity the poor woodpeckers when they come home.—Child's Paper.

When I see a well-fed, dogmatic husband, who has a care-worn wife, I think of the steaks, the pudding, and the bonnet, and wonder if poor Mrs. Finley is the only woman who, to gratify a selfish husband, is made the victim of "saving in something else."

The next day there was a juicy rumpsteak for dinner, but no pudding.

"Why, how is this? No sweets today, when I like, as you know, my dear, some sort of sweets?"

"I thought I would save the extra money for the steak in that way," timidly answered the wife.

"Good gracious, no! I'd rather do without anything else," tartly replied the husband.

The tears came into the wife's eyes. But she knew her husband hated what he called a "scene," and so she choked down her emotion. There were few words spoken during the meal.

The third day, the meat course was again excellent, and the joint was done "to a turn." Mr. Finley was in capital humor, as he always was over good eating, till the pudding came in, which consisted of a plain rice one. At the sight of this the gloom gathered on his brow.

"Poor man's pudding, I declare! Really, Anne, one would think, from the fare you provide, that I was a bankrupt!"

"Indeed, James, I do try to please you," said the wife, bursting into tears. "But I can't afford to give you everything—provisions are so high; and I thought you'd rather have a cheap pudding than to do without your nice joint."

"Pshaw! don't cry," hastily replied Mr. Finley. "To be sure, I'd rather do without a good pudding than not have the other," he continued placably. "But there's really no necessity for it, my dear; for in so large a household as ours there are plenty of things on which the price of a good pudding might be saved."

No more was said on the subject that day. But a few mornings after Mr. Finley, on tasting his coffee, said, suddenly putting down his cup, "What is the matter with your coffee, my dear? Really, that grocer has cheated you. Why, tasting it again, 'this stuff is chocky, and not coffee at all.'"

"It is not the grocer's fault," Mrs. Finley mustered courage to say. "I knew it was chocky when I bought it. Our expenses are so high, my dear, that we must save in something; but I thought it would be felt least, perhaps, in the coffee."

"The very last thing to save," angrily said Mr. Finley, pushing away his cup. "I'd rather drink cold water than this stuff!"

And cold water he did drink, though his wife, almost ready to cry, offered to have some tea made.

Mrs. Finley is still endeavoring to "save in something else," for her husband will not deny himself in anything, and forgets to increase her allowance. Her last experiment was to forego a new winter bonnet. But her husband, on seeing her come down dressed for Church, on a bright, frosty morning, with her last year's faded bonnet on, grew very angry, declaring that "there was no need to make herself look like a fright—he wasn't a broken tradesman." But when "one of the children told him why the old bonnet was worn, he made no offer to increase his wife's stipend; but only grumbled, sulkily, that "she might have saved it in something else."

When I see a well-fed, dogmatic husband, who has a care-worn wife, I think of the steaks, the pudding, and the bonnet, and wonder if poor Mrs. Finley is the only woman who, to gratify a selfish husband, is made the victim of "saving in something else."

Text Enforced.

Many a troubled one has found comfort in those sweet words of Jesus, "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest." A monument in the Isle of Wight records how these words were the chief support of a princess in England, two centuries ago.

The Princess Elizabeth, daughter of Charles I., lies buried in Newport church, in the Isle of Wight. A marble monument, erected by the gracious Queen Victoria, records in a touching way the manner of her death. She languished in Carisbrood Castle, during the unhappy Commonwealth wars, a prisoner, alone and separate from all the companions of her youth, until death set her free. She was found dead one day, with her head leaning on the Bible open at the words, "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest." The monument in Newport church records the fact. It consists of a female figure reclining her head on a marble book, with the text already quoted engraved on the book. Think, reader, what a sermon in stone that monument preaches. Think what a standing memorial it affords of the utter inability of rank and high birth to confer certain happiness. Think what a testimony it bears to the lesson before you this day—the mighty lesson that there is no true rest for any one excepting in Christ. Happy will it be for your soul if that lesson is never forgotten.

From Good Words.

THE DYING COITAGER.

My reaper lies beside the wall,
My fall hangs on the door.
Though now the yellow corn is ripe
I shall not want them more.
But, Roger, when will be
For thy old living father's sake,
Use them right lustily.

Thou hast been over-well as yet,
Sneer now thou wilt grow staid:
Give o'er thy foolish counting, lad,
Of Nell, the miller's maid;
And if thy head must have a wife,
Take Mary Hedges' word,
She's not so comely quite as Nell,
But modest and good.

Ah! Roger, I shall soon be gone;
Be a father then
To Jenny, and to Lark, and Sam,
But most of all to Ben.
And do not make him toll too hard,
Nor chide him when he's sad;
His mother read him tenderly,
He's but a weakly lad.

The doctor has been here to-day,
He need not come again,
He's done for me what man could do,
He's somewhat eased my pain.
The person came when he was gone,
That was a comfort too;
He told me I was like to die,
And now I feel it true.

Come, Jenny, dry thy foolish eyes,
We must die some day;
I've heard thee from the Bible read
We are made of clay.
Thou'lt be a good and loving child,
My blessing nod my pride,
And but for thee I sore had miss'd
My poor wife, when she died.

If God had will'd it, I would fain
Have stay'd with thee awhile
To guard thee from too bold a gaze,
And from the breath of guile;
For thou art very fair, my child,
Sweet as a rose, in truth,
And now the hardest thing I have
Is leaving thee in youth.

When the young Squire shall pass this way
Don't stand beside the door;
It looks so good when such as he Smiles on a man in poor
But if a lad of thy degree,
And of a sober life,
Like Ralph, should woo thee honestly,
Then, Jenny, be his wife.

If sometimes I have seem'd too stern
When things have gone amiss,
Forgive me children, 'twas in love
I chid'd ye for this.
If ye should think upon my ways,
The right they'll seem to be;
When ye shall have your bread to win,
And children at your knee.

I little thought with all my toil
To live ye shining pearl;
But look with awe on your pouch
Our Jenny made herself.
Some hard-earn'd shillings there ye'll find
I laid by now and then,
There's one piece, and overmore
A silver groat for Ben.

But there's a treasure of more worth Than silver, gold, or ought—
The Holy Bible, children, 'tis,
Your blessing, when ye brought.
She was a scholar, as ye mind,
And spelt it night and morn;
I will it with my dying breath
To Roger, our first-born.

Give Luke and Sam my garden tools,
They'll want them ere long;
There's little for them they should want
Through idleness or sloth.
Let Jenny be the endow-clock,
She loves to hear it strike;
Whatever else I leave behind
I'd have ye share alike.

Now gather round me all of ye,
I grow more feeble and weak,
And in a little while I wonder Shall have the breath to speak:
The darkness settles on my sight,
I cannot see ye clear,
But I can feel your loving hands;
God bless ye, children dear!

Ye'll lay me in the churchyard nigh,
Your mother close beside,
The same green sod will cover both—
Death does not long divide;
We all shall meet again one day,
And better off than here;
Now round my bed kneel all of ye,
God bless ye, children dear!

Fashions and Follies of Hair.

"A woman's glory is her hair" has been often quoted. If it be she is determined to dim it in these days of artificiality and fashionable folly. Now she twists not only her own hair, but as much as she can purchase, into the most unseemly and grotesque shapes, marring, as if with premeditated bad taste, every graceful curve and every line of beauty. A fashionable woman's head at present is a wonder of unsightliness. One would not think so many of the sex could, without positive genius for the hideous, so deform themselves as they do in a single sitting. They rise in the morning, and go from the bath comely and charming as nature created them. They appear two hours after, fresh from the hands of their maid, or their own manipulations, elaborately wrought out of all symmetry and attractiveness, especially in regard to their hair.

Ingenuity appears to have been exhausted of late years to make a woman's hair look like anything else; to give her head a size and form and proportion little less than repulsive. Curls, crimps, bands, waterfalls, and we know not what, vie with each other in destroying the fair semblance of the human head. The more homely a fashion, the more likely it is to be a favorite. The more unbecoming the more apt it is to endure. One cannot go into a company that pretends to be elegant without having his eyes pained by the uncouthness of the hair dressing and the distortion of all that good taste would suggest. He is reminded of stage goblins, or of his childish notions of the monsters of the Arabian tales. O, for a few brave, sensible women, who would dare to be natural, dare to defy the dictates of fashion, when fashion arrays itself against simplicity, fitness and grace. Those few could reform the foibles and insanities of dress. What they did, others would be bold to do, and the reign of reason and beauty would begin again.

The present style of wearing the waterfall on top of the head—it was bad enough behind it—is simply a deformity. It destroys the proportion of the head, and is an excrescence that no one can refrain from desiring to remove, even by violence. A woman might as well have a bump on her back, or walk on stilts, as it is said she did in the early days of Venice, or cover one of her soft cheeks with a black plaster, or wear rings in her nose. But she will not believe it; for no woman would consciously mar her beauty, or diminish the grace she had inherited. Who does not long for the simple arrangement of the hair, as we see it in Grecian statues, plainly put back from the face, or falling over the ears and cheek, with a neat coil behind, or a braid, if variety be needed?

No woman has a right to spoil her appearance for fashion's sake. She owes more to beauty and to nature than to the mantua maker or to caprice; and we must believe the time will come when the really fine woman will consider carefully the extent and sacredness of her debt, and discharge it conscientiously and religiously.

In What Respects the Situation has Changed.

In the New York World, of the 26th, we find a leading editorial in relation to the situation of affairs in the Southern States. The World takes the ground that the South would now be justified in resisting martial law, as established by the military reconstruction bill, but that resistance would be unwise and hopeless. We copy as follows:

We advised and approved of the rejection by the South of the constitutional amendment. If we hesitate, as yet, to give, similar advice respecting the reorganization proposed in Sherman's bill, it is because circumstances have, in essential respects, so totally changed, that a new and comprehensive survey of the situation is a necessary prerequisite to intelligent action. The two chief features of Sherman's bill are outrages which baffled foresight, because it was not supposed or supposed that such a stretch of perfidy and inconsistency could be ventured upon. Sherman's bill provides for the overthrow of the Southern State governments, and for putting the whole section under the rigors of martial law.

We had what seemed to be solid reasons for supposing that neither of these outrages would be perpetrated. In relation to the State governments, we supposed that the Republican party would be bound by its own recognition of those governments. The importance which they attached to the emancipation amendment, and the fact that they recognized the Southern ratifications of it as valid, precluded them, in logic and consistency, from afterwards calling in question the competency of the ratifying State governments. Congress has acknowledged the validity of the Southern ratifications of that amendment, in a dozen different ways. It has repeatedly made it the basis of legislation, and even in proposing the amendment now pending, it recognized its validity by numbering the proposed amendment as the fourteenth, which it could not be unless there was a thirteenth, and the thirteenth is precisely the emancipation amendment. It seemed against all antecedent probability, that a Republican Congress would displace this amendment from the Constitution, by declaring that the ratifying States which made up the three-fourths, were not competent to act upon it. Even the pending amendment was submitted to the Southern States and their ratifications asked. Was it to be expected that Congress would so stultify itself as to declare illegal the very Government it had thus recognized?

Putting the South under martial law was as little to have been expected, in any reasonable calculation. Martial law, by its very nature and definition, is a suspension of the habeas corpus; and the constitution declares, with as much emphasis as it says anything, that the habeas corpus shall not be suspended except in times of rebellion or invasion. There being no rebellion, it was not to have been expected that the South would be again put under martial law.

If these two outrageous and unexpected measures had not been reported to the South, would stand on strong vantage-ground for baffling the Radicals. The worst that could be done was to exclude the Southern members of Congress; an evil that might be borne with composure so long as the South held control of its internal affairs through State governments, freely chosen by its white citizens. The extent of the evil was payment of federal taxes without federal representation. But with the State governments abolished, and the whole people subject to martial law, the situation is changed, and the consequences of resistance so stupendously magnified, that it is important to take new observations and hearings before deciding on the future direction of the voyage.

We suppose it will be found, when the South can abate its just indignation sufficiently for a careful survey, that it possesses no machinery or resources, either political or military, for fending off this atrocious oppression. If no such machinery or resources shall be discoverable, the practical question will then be, whether the South shall accept the situation under protest, or disinclinedly submit to it. Were it not for the negro element of the problem, the latter would undoubtedly be the true course, as alike consistent with safety and self-respect. But the negro element complicates the question, and renders the solution more difficult. It is possible that the Republicans may, through Government patronage and appeals to ambition, bribe and demoralize Southern whites enough to make, with the negroes, a majority of the inhabitants. If they can succeed in this, they will reorganize and admit the States, and the South will thereafter be under negro rule, and will become intolerable as the residence of white men. Admitting (at least by hypothesis) that this danger is not fanciful, the question arises (and a very grave one it is) whether it is not better to "fight the devil with fire," by accepting the negro suffrage which is inevitable, and controlling the negro vote, instead of allowing it to be alienated to the Republicans, as it would pretty certainly be by resistance. Whether the negro vote could be managed by the planters, and whether whites enough could be seduced to make the Radical plan work, are questions that cannot be answered without more local knowledge than we possess; but we suppose all intelligent Southerners must allow that these questions ought to be well considered before taking an irreversible resolution.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

The general market has exhibited a fair degree of animation during the past three days. Sugar and Molasses have been in demand, at previous prices, and the movement in Western Produce has been to a liberal extent, attended with an easy feeling in Pork, and a better tone in Flour. Corn and Oats; while operations in our leading staples have been less restricted, and, notwithstanding unfavorable advice from Liverpool and New York, factors have succeeded, under the influence of very light receipts, in imparting an improved feeling to prices, the market closing yesterday at our quotations, with a tendency to increase tomorrow.

COTTON—On Saturday, the unintermitting telephony of the weather partially suspended outdoor operations, and consequently the sales were exceedingly light, comprising barely 2200 bales, at previous prices. On Monday, despite unfavorable advice from New York and Liverpool, increased stringency on the part of holders—the latter predicated on meagre receipts—and inadequate offerings, the demand was active throughout, resulting in sales of 5600 bales, at prices indicating, in some instances, a net gain of 1/10 per pound. Yesterday there was a continuance of the previous good demand, but, owing to the extremely limited character of the offerings as well as the enhanced views of holders, the sales were less liberal, footing up barely 2900 bales, at previous prices, the market closing at our quotations, with a tendency to greater firmness.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 11,700 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 646 bales, against 9543 during the corresponding period last week, showing a decrease of 3083 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 691,061 bales, against 524,742 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 38,002 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 40,331 bales to Great Britain, of 28,648 to France, and an increase of 11,216 bales to other foreign ports.

Low—Ordinary, 26 1/2 to 27 1/2
Good Ordinary, 27 1/2 to 28 1/2
Low Middling, 28 1/2 to 29 1/2
Middling, 29 1/2 to 30 1/2

TOBACCO—The demand continues very active, but the stock is too small for large operations. Supplies of the new crop would sell readily at high prices. There have been sales during the past three days of 150 hogsheads, of which 98 hhds, old Low to Medium Leaf at 6 1/2, 19 new Leaf at 10c and 18 at 12c per lb. We repeat our previous quotations for reference, although they cannot be considered better than inside prices:

Light—Ordinary, 3 to 3 1/2
Good, 3 1/2 to 4
Common Leaf 5 to 6
Fair, 6 to 7
Good, 7 to 8
Fine, 8 to 9
Choice Select, 9 to 10

FLOUR—The stock is light; the demand, though only local, is quite fair, and the market is steady and firm. There were sales on Saturday and Monday of 3000 barrels at $9 25 to $9 50 per bbl for Low Fine, $11 to $11 1/2 for Superfine, $13 to $13 50 for Double Extra, $14 to $15 for Triple Extra, and $15 50 to $16 50 per bbl for Choice Extra. Yesterday the sales embraced 2500 bbls at $9 to $9 50 for Fine, $11 to $11 25 for Superfine, $11 95 to $12 for Single Extra, $14 50 for Double Extra, $15 50 for Triple Extra, and $16 to $16 50 for Choice Extra. The choice grades of Extra are scarce and most in request, and command very full prices readily.

Cattle Market.
Wednesday evening, March 14, 1867.
Western Beef, choice per lb net, 10 to 15
Texas Beef, 2d quality, per lb net, 12 to 15
Texas Cattle Choice per head, $45 to 70
Texas Cattle 2d qual, per head, $40 to 60
Texas Cattle 3d qual, per head, $35 to 45
Hogs per 100 lbs, $12 to 15
Sheep in lots, per head, $3 25 to $4 00
Creole Sheep, per head, $4 50 to $6 00
Texas Sheep, per head, $4 50 to $6 00
Choice Sheep, per head, $6 to $8
Milk Cows, per head, $50 to $80
Milk Cows, with calves, $12 to $25
Yearlings, per head, $10 to $18
Calves per head, $7 00 to $12

HORSE AND MULE MARKET.
Saddle and light harness Horses, $200 to $400
Heavy draft Horses, 175 to 300
Common do, 75 to 100
Mules, 1st quality, broke, 200 to 225
Do 2d do, 150 to 180
Do 1st do, unbroke, 100 to 125
Do 2d do, 75 to 100
Mexican Mules, 40 to 60

Monetary.
The movement in Coin has been unusually restricted, and rates, assimilating to the course of the New York market, have been attended with further irregularity. On Saturday Gold opened nominally at 134, but evinced improvement later in the day, and closed firm at 134 1/4 to 135; it opened on Monday at 134 1/4 to 134 1/2, and after selling as high as 135 1/4, eased off, and closed steady at 135 to 135 1/4, and opened yesterday at 134 1/4, and after the transaction of a very limited business, closed at 134 1/4 to 134 1/2.

ORGAN OF THE M. E. CHURCH SOUTH FOR THE MOBILE, MONTGOMERY, MISSISSIPPI AND LOUISIANA CONFERENCES

VOLUME XIII—NUMBER 10.
WHOLE NUMBER 619.

NEW ORLEANS, SATURDAY, MARCH 23, 1867.

($100 A YEAR IN ADVANCE.)
OFFICE—115 CAMP STREET.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.
LINES TO MY HUSBAND.
BY JULIA WESTWOOD.

Three fleeting years of sun and shade,
Have softly o'er us sped,
With wealth of love, and heart-content,
Since you and I were wed.

We've had no cloud to mar the hues
Of rainbow hints or flowers,
For God has been so good to bless
This wedded life of ours.

He gives us health and riches too,
Sweet home-joys all aglow,
Oh, may He lead us all the way
As side by side we go.

There must be thorns where roses grow,
And some notes out of tune,
But oh, our lives are bright thus far,
As laughing flowers in June.

There must be briars where berries grow,
And wheat and tares together;
But God has let the sun shine through,
Our all of life-time weather.

I look upon your manly brow,
And in your mild blue eye,
And sigh to think that you and I,
And all we love must die.

That in a few more passing years,
The willow-boughs will wave,
And violets and daisies grow,
Above our quiet grave.

Oh may we live, that after death,
Our beautiful abode,
May be where Christ and Angels dwell,
The City of our God.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.
THE CHURCH IN CHINA.

MR. EDITOR: The question is often asked, "what of your Chinese converts? What sort of Christians do they make?" This is a question of no ordinary interest to every intelligent friend of the China Mission, for upon the character of the native converts, depends the future church of China. What will that church be? The individual and national peculiarities of the foreign missionary, made but little impression upon the Chinese. They discriminate readily and clearly between a man and his creed; between the principles which he professes, and the practices which characterize his life; between what is essential, and what is merely accidental. The gospel is not to them a foreign system of religion, but a system of religion, true or false, held to be the only true religion by foreigners.

They will sometimes say, "I may believe the Bible to be true, without believing your interpretation of it."

The Insurgents declared that they had discovered many errors in our interpretation, both of the Old and new Testaments. The native Christians show the same tendency. They say, "truth is naked—you clothe it to suit your taste. It is truth in diffé costume, or in foreign dress.

You may put the ornaments of truth on falsehood, but this does not change its character, it is falsehood still. A native may wear foreign clothes, but it does not make him a reignier." Again they say, "there is no monopoly of truth. It is not limited to time or space; is unconquered and universal."

The gospel will, therefore, assume immediately, a Chinese dress in our active churches in China, and the conventional peculiarities which all distinguish the church there, will be indigenous, and not imported from the missionaries of Europe or America. This peculiarity

Chinese character, is illustrated in the remarkable fact, that though jugated by the Tartars, and conquered by them for more than

The future church of China, will like every thing else in that strange land, be distinctively Chinese. The civil, social, and domestic institutions, in all that is not essentially antagonistic to the fundamental principles of the gospel, will exert a forming influence upon the new church, giving to it social and economical peculiarities, strangely diverse from that of the West. The indigenous system of philosophical belief, both moral and metaphysical, must also exert a prodigious influence over the native mind, in its perceptions and comprehension of Christian truth. To suppose otherwise, we must disregard altogether the history of our own theological creeds. Any well read man can trace in the theology of our schools, fragments of Greek philosophy today. The Socratic and Platonic theories, had much to do in corrupting the simplicity of the primitive faith, and in bringing about schism in the church. It will be so in China. Their philosophy is not the grotesque and lifeless mummy, some imagine, but a commanding power, which not only regulates speculative belief, but enters into the practical every-day life of the multitude. Of the two predominant systems, one is materialistic, the other atheistic. The materialistic philosophy is a pleasing pan-theism, inweaving itself with the common forms of nature, and explaining the perplexing phenomenon of life and death, growth and decay.
It boasts the proud distinction of reason, and is thus extremely captivating to the self-admiring literary amateur. The other is a profound labyrinth of subtle metaphysical dogmas, ending in barren atheism, but possessing a ritual of surpassing gorgeousness. The Asiatic imagination has always been fruitful of idle abstractions, and bombastic symbolism. It delights in the airy regions of speculation, and in the barbaric splendors of oriental ritualism. Nearly all the heresies which have disturbed the Christian Church in the West, had their roots in Asia. We cannot expect the church planted in such a soil, to escape.

My present limits will not permit a further discussion of this interesting question, as it relates to the philosophy of China. I have barely broached the subject. Had I space, the effects likely to result from the influence of Chinese philosophy upon the theology of the coming church, would deserve attention. I must not however indulge this topic at present.

Other causes will operate to modify the church in China. The constitutional peculiarities of the people; their mental and emotional temperament, must do much to characterize the style of their piety.
They are by nature phlegmatic, and their philosophical as well religious systems, inculcate silence, and the control of the passions. They appear to us destitute of feeling.
Their demonstrations of joy, are in our eyes extremely moderate, and the expressions of sorrow, except formal and professional mourning, almost heartless. There is, however, under this indifferent exterior, often the deepest feeling. The Chinese are not destitute of feeling, though of a much less excitable nervous temperament than Anglo-Saxons. Their piety will of course be less demonstrative.

A large majority of our converts are from the lower and middle classes of society, except in a few instances, we have not yet reached the cultivated mind of China. We know the effect of education upon the emotional temperament of men.
We must therefore conclude, that the native church of the present, is but an imperfect type of the future church, in all those particulars, in which education makes a difference.
We may infer these differences,

however, and anticipate the coming character of the church. After a ten years careful study of Chinese character, and an intimate acquaintance with many native Christians,
I suppose the Christian Church in China, will differ from the church in our country, mainly in the following particulars.

1. It will have a much more elaborate creed, making distinctions where we perceive none.

2. It will surpass us in ritualistic observances. It will keep feasts and fasts with great ceremony.

3. It will be less rigid in discipline, but more uniform in practice, less emotional, but perhaps not less devotional.

4. It will have a zealous and laborious ministry. Pastoral labor will be a prominent feature of the native ministry.

I will now close these observations, by saying, that more earnest, consistent, useful Christians, I never saw, than some of our native members in China. The church at Shanghai, will compare favorably with any Christian congregation in this country. Does the Southern Methodist Church appreciate that little company of brethren and sisters as it ought? The whole Christian Church was once as small a company. God bless them!

Your Bro. in Christ,
W. G. E. CUNNINGHAM.

METHODISM AMONG THE GER-MANS.

More than other countries has Germany been the battlefield for theologians. Nor was this mere accident. Treat on bombastic harangues of pettifoggish demagogues, and the American's eye glances with intense interest; dwell on a cock-fight, and the Mexican is all ear; elaborate on military parade, and the finest cut of the Empress Eugenie's petticoat, and the Frenchman's mind is altogether absorbed; but treat on theology, and the Germans, erudite and illiterate, are so many interested polemicists.
The Germans are a thoughtful, serious people; and, though, among them much scepticism is found, few, if any, are such professed nihilists as abound in this country. The most inveterate German rationalist would deem it an insult to be denominated an infidel.

It was this seriousness by means of which the popes, through Tetzel Eck, and others, wielded such powerful influence over the Germans; this same characteristic trait of his country-people came to the help of Luther, in his efforts to counteract the pernicious influence of Rome; and by means of the same peculiarity, Schleiermacher's scepticism of the eighteenth century, became the scepticism of his entire fatherland.

But, again, a reaction has taken place in the minds of the Germans.
At length it has been discovered, that rationalism, so-called, was very irrational, and that the great teachers of the same, were not so much convinced of what they taught, as they were actuated by a thirst for fame. To bring about this reaction, Methodism played a conspicuous part. Not, indeed, so successfully, because the M. E. Church, North established in Germany, a mission Conference under Dr. Jacoby, a converted Jew—and which Conference numbers now some thirty-six missionaries, scattered throughout the land; but principally through its literature, which in "the land of love," found numerous translators;
thus, placing Wesley's and Fletcher's works in the hands of the hundred cottager.

But in America, specially, has Methodism found a genial home;
and that too, among the Germans.
It was in the year 1835, that the subject of winning the immigrated

Germans over to Methodism, was first agitated. Bishop Morris, then editor of the "Western Christian Advocate" was the first who brought the subject. Very justly, he remarked then, among other things, that, if the Methodists would not undertake to win the foreign element over to their side, the Catholics would soon celebrate its entire absorption. This appeal was not made in vain. In that same year, the Ohio Conference, received Dr. Wm. Nast, within its ranks—a man of extensive erudite acquisitions—laboring in Cincinnati with eminent success. Soon, other missionaries were added, among whom Peter Schmucker appears to have been the most eminent. Thus the work increased with unprecedented rapidity. With the assistance of his American brethren, Dr. Nast, in 1839, first published his "Christlicher Apologete," a celebrated religious periodical, ever since, making its regular weekly appearance, and numbering at present, over 20,000 subscribers. Already in 1854, there were 187 effective German Methodist preachers, representing 12,145 members of their denomination. At present, the number of preachers and church-members, is more than thrice as large.

Until recently, the German "itin-erants" of the "Church, North," were always members of those Conferences, in whose bounds their work was situated. But, now, they are divided into three separate Conferences, which are, however, presided over by an American bishop.

In the Southern States, the Germans are not so numerous, nor has Methodism, even proportionately, been so successful among them as in the North. Indeed, among the intelligent Germans in the South, exists a deep-rooted prejudice against Methodism. From childhood, they were accustomed to look upon preachers as very learned men—in Germany, the preachers are learned men—and, hence, they are filled with disgust, when from the pulpit they hear in beautiful meddles, the accusative confounded with the dative, etc. No German ought to be licensed to preach, until he can give evidence conclusive that he is a master of his fair mother tongue.

In Texas, German Methodism is most prosperous. Under the able management of F. Vardenhammen and C. A. Grote, it has assumed quite a creditable tone.

BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.

EPISCOPAL METHODIST CONFERENCE.

This body assembled yesterday morning, at nine o'clock, at the Trinity Episcopal Methodist Church, corner of Preston street and Madison avenue. Bishop Pierce presided, Bishops Early and Doggett being present and taking part in the deliberations. After the religious exercises, Bishop Pierce delivered a brief address, and was followed by Bishop Doggett, who gave much sound advice to the ministers in attendance. Rev. John S. Martin, secretary of the last conference, acted as secretary. During the early part of the session Bishop Pierce introduced to the Conference the venerable Rev. Lovick Pierce, of Georgia, his father; Rev. George Smith, of the Georgia Conference;
Rev. Dr. Deems, of the North Carolina Conference; Rev. Mr. McTeer, of the Holston Conference, and the Rev. Peyton Harrison, of the Presbyterian Church of this city.

On motion, the preachers in charge of the churches in the city attached to the conference were constituted a committee on public worship, with Rev. Mr. Register, the presiding elder, as chairman.

The committees were then announced.

The various districts were then called on for reports, and the presiding elders then responded.
Baltimore District—S. Register, presiding elder.—The report was very favorable. Where there were only hundreds of members of the church at the commencement of the year, there were now thousands.
A number of churches had been erected, and either paid for or funds gathered for the purpose, and everything had progressed much more satisfactorily than could have been expected. Mr. Register fully believed that what was now seen was only the beginning of the good work.

Washington District—John S.
Martin, presiding elder.—Mr. M. said that the war had left his district in great distress, but the preachers went to work earnestly.
They were left mostly without church property, but those in charge had the will, and at the present time matters looked prosperous. If the privations suffered by the ministers of the church could be known, they would astonish the world.
Rev. Mr. Landstreet spoke in warm terms of Rev. Mr. Martin, of whom praise was like gilding refined gold.

Winchester District—E. R. Veitch,
(now deceased) presiding elder.—
Rev. Norval Wilson spoke in feeling terms of the deceased, and at his request Rev. W. E. Eggleston responded for the district, he having been the former presiding elder, and a warm personal friend of deceased.
He spoke of the wants and privations of his district, caused by the war, and said that where a short time since all was gloom, matters now were assuming a brighter aspect.

The Rev. Joshua Register submitted a preamble of resolution con-curring in the recommendations of the General Conference changing the name of the body to that of the Episcopal Methodist Conference, and also for admitting lay representatives to the body, which, on his motion, were made the order of the day for Friday morning, at 11 o'clock.

Bishop Pierce then read a telegram just received from Nashville, Tennessee, announcing the death of Bishop Soule, in that city, at ten o'clock this morning, and at his suggestion the session was closed with prayer by Bishop Early.

SECOND DAY.

The Conference was opened with devotional exercises, after which Bishop Pierce called the body to order.

The annual report of A. H. Redford, book agent at Nashville, Tennessee, was presented and read.

The Bishop introduced to the Conference the Rev. Dr. McFerrin, of Nashville, Tenn., corresponding secretary of the domestic board of missions; Rev. Dr. E. W. Sehon, secretary of the board of foreign missions; Rev. W. W. Bennett, editor of the Richmond Christian Advocate; Rev. J. C. Granberry, of Petersburg, Va.; Rev. Wm. B. Rowzie, presiding elder of Fredericksburg district, Virginia Conference, and Rev. Nelson Head, formerly of the Baltimore Conference, but now of Richmond, Va.; Rev. J. Lefevre, of the Presbyterian Church; Rev.
T. D. Valiant, Rev. D. Bowers, Rev.
J. T. Murray, Rev. P. Light Wilson,
Rev. E. J. Drinkhouse, all of the Methodist Protestant Church, and
Col. Johnson, president of Randolph Macon College, all of whom were invited to seats.

The committee on examinations being ready to report, the Bishop asked the question, "Who are admitted on trial?" The following were reported as having favorably passed examination and were admitted on trial: Rufus H. Wilson, J. W. Jar-dan, Walter W. Watts, of Baltimore district; H. Monroe Strickland, Rockingham district; Robert H. G.
Pecran and Alexander M. Cooper, of Lewisburg district; William Marshall Heimer, James T. Smith and Silas R. Snapp, of South Branch district.

On motion of Rev. S. Register,
the Rev. Alfred A. Eskridge, Rev.
R. P. Fraughton, Rev. J. Newman
Hank, Rev. Charles G. Linthicum and Rev. H. D. Parrish, all former members of the East Baltimore Conference, but who had withdrawn their connections with that body, were admitted members of the Episcopal Methodist Conference.
Rev. S. Register, in the course of some remarks, said that he was happy to see the members come back to the true faith. All the test-oath he would require was that they should subscribe to Methodism as it was in the days of the fathers of the church, and to preach the gospel as laid down by the Word of God. He cared not for the date of their repentance—whether it was ten, five, or one year ago, or even the present time—he looked upon them all as welcome to the folds of the mother Methodist Church.
On motion, the Rev. Sylvanus Townsend, who had withdrawn from the Philadelphia Conference of the Philadelphia Methodist Episcopal Church, he having refused to subscribe to the creed of that branch of the church, was admitted as a member of the Episcopal Methodist Conference.

The Rev. Bishop Early announced that there was a committee present from the Virginia Conference to confer with a committee of the Baltimore Conference in reference to the division of the Baltimore and Virginia Conferences into three conferences, the privilege having been granted by the late General Conference at Richmond. The following were appointed the committee on the part of the Baltimore Conference: Revs. Samuel Rogers, John L. Gilbert, David Thomas and John Landstreet.

The Rev. Bishop Early also moved the appointment of a committee to confer with similar committees of the Virginia and Holston Conferences in reference to extending patronage to Randolph Macon College and Emory and Henry College, which was carried, and the chair appointed the following: S. S.
Koszel, John Poisel, R. R. S. Hough,
W. S. Baird, and John Landstreet.
The names of the superannuated or worn-out preachers were then called. Norval Wilson was changed, at his request, from superannuated to supernumerary. Elias Welty, at his own request, was changed from superannuated to effective. David Trout and F. M. Mills were continued on the superannuated list.

THIRD DAY.

The Conference was opened with religious exercises. On the body being called to order by the Bishop, and during the morning, the following visitors were introduced: Rev.
A. H. Redford, book agent at Nashville, Tennessee; Rev. Messrs. Lang-horn, Judkins and Ware, of the Virginia Conference; Rev. Mr. Wilson, of the North Carolina Conference; the Rev. W. A. Harris, of the Wesleyan Female Institute, at Staunton, Va.; Rev. Dr. Leroy M. Lee, of the Virginia Conference; Rev. M.
Finley, late of the Virginia Conference, now of the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist Conference; the Rev.
Mr. Williams, of the Baptist Church, and the Rev. Dr. Bullock, of the Presbyterian Church. Both of the last named gentlemen made some suitable remarks on being introduced, and tendered their churches to the Conference on Sunday.

The Rev. Dr. McFerrin, of Nashville, Tennessee, corresponding secretary of the domestic board of missions, on invitation of the Bishop, delivered an address fully explaining the working of the domestic missionary work.

The order of the day, the resolution offered by the Rev. Samuel Register, on the first day of the session, proposing to change the name of the Conference to "Episcopal Methodist," was taken up.
Without debate, the question was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows—yeas 104, nays none.

On motion, it was ordered that absent members be allowed to record their votes on their appearance in the Conference.

The second order, being the resolutions offered by Mr. Register, to admit lay delegates to annual conferences, was then taken up. There was no debate on the subject, and the vote by yeas and nays resulted as follows: yeas 104, nays none.

The Bishop announced Rev.
Messrs. Norval Wilson, Register and Kepler as a committee on the funeral services of the late Bishop Soule.

To the question, "What local preachers have been elected deacons this year?" the following were recommended by their presiding elders, and they were passed to deacons's orders: Jas. Hobbs and Wm. H.
P. Hooper, of Baltimore district;
Samuel Brown, of Washington district; Alex. M. Cooper and Wm.
Richardson, of Lewisburg district, and Wm. Hodgson, of Winchester district.

To the question, "What local preachers are elected elders this year?" the following were recommended by their presiding elders:
Sylvanus Townsend, George M.
Lighner, William A. Wade and James W. Bennett, and they were passed to elders' orders.

The Rev. A. H. Redford then delivered a lengthy address on the general interests of the publishing house, giving a detailed account of his connection therewith, from the date of its evacuation by the Federal troops, who had destroyed everything, up to the present time.
Col. Johnson, president of Randolph
Macon College, also made an address in behalf of his institution, after which the Conference adjourned.

DEATH OF BISHOP SOULE.

When the agitation of the subject of slavery so convulsed the Methodist Episcopal Church that a division was found necessary—though neither honor any member of his family was ever identified with the institution—yet believing the Southern Conference to be right, according to the platform of the Discipline and the word of God, Bishop Soule deliberately and firmly took his stand with the Southern brethren. At the first General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, May, 1846, he formally announced his adherence in the following communication:

"Rev. and Dear Brethren:—I consider your body, as now organized, as the consummation of the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in conformity to the 'Plan of Separation,' adopted by the General Conference of the M. E. Church, in 1844. It is therefore in strict agreement with the provisions of that body, that you are vested with full power to transact all business appropriate to a Methodist General Conference.

"I view this organization as having been commenced in the 'Declaration' of the delegates of the Conference in the slaveholding States, made at New York, in 1844; and as having advanced in its several stages in the 'Protest'—the 'Plan of Separation'—the appointment of delegates to the Louisville Convention—in the action of that body—in the subsequent action of the Annual Conference, approving the acts of their delegates at the Convention, and in the appointment of delegates to this General Conference.

"The organization of the M. E. Church, South, being thus completed in the organization of the General Conference with a constitutional President, the time has arrived when it is proper for me to announce my position. Sustaining no relation to one Annual Conference which I did not sustain to every other, and considering the General Conference as the proper judicatory to which my communication should be made, I have declined making this announcement until the present time. And now, acting with strict regard to the 'Plan of Separation,' and under a solemn conviction of duty, I formally declare my adherence to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. And if the Conference receive me in my present relation to the Church, I am ready to serve them according to the best of my ability. In conclusion, I indulge the joyful assurance, that although separated from our Northern brethren by a distinct Conference jurisdiction, we shall never cease to treat them as 'brethren beloved,' and cultivate those principles and affections which constitute the essential unity of the Church of Christ.

"JOSHUA SOULE."

This admirable document evinces the clear head, the sound judgment, and the nobility of spirit, for which Bishop Soule was so distinguished. His act of adherence was the more remarkable, as he was a New Englander by birth, and resided at the time in the State of Ohio. All his antecedents and surroundings would seem to suggest an adherence to the Church, North. But he was always accustomed to view things in "a dry light," and not to swerve one jot or one tittle from what he considered the exact line of duty. To say that he was in his dotage, is a little too absurd. Does that document indicate dotage? He must have declined into dotage very vast, as it was not three years before the General Conference at which the Plan of Separation was adopted, that with so much credit and applause, he had represented the Methodist Episcopal Church in the British Conference. We feel safe in asserting that there was not a man in the world that understood the questions at issue between the North and the South better than Bishop Soule—no man in the world less likely to be influenced by any sinister consideration—and yet he deliberately adhered to the Southern Church, believing it to be altogether right, and the Northern Church altogether wrong, in this great controversy.

It is needless to say that he was received in his character as the Senior Bishop of the Southern Church, with gratitude and joy. The tens of thousands of our Communion have recognized him as their Joshua, indeed—the leader of the hosts of Israel. How he discharged the duties of his high office—what valuable services he rendered in his Episcopal visitations, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific—and the honors which he everywhere received—furnish agreeable and edifying topics for his future biographer.

A full-length portrait of Bishop Soule will not be expected in this place, even if we were capable of executing it. We can only glance at a few of his prominent traits.

That which was especially characteristic of Bishop Soule, was his moral grandeur. It seems impossible to imagine him capable of any thing trifling or puerile, not to say mean and base. His conceptions were sublime. His mind moved on an elevated plane. He dignified even commonplace subjects, by the manner in which he handled them. This was seen not only in his sermons, and his demeanor in the Episcopal chair, but also in his familiar conversations.

This, too, was based upon an inflexible integrity. He would not swerve the breadth of a hair from what he considered exactly right. He was slow in coming to his conclusions; but when they were reached, he remained firm on them as a rock of adamant. He declined the Episcopate in 1820, because he could not exercise it under what he considered improper and humiliating restrictions. In 1824, when a pamphlet had been circulated by some of the leaders in the Baltimore Conference, of which he was then a member, impeaching his character on account of his opposition to the Presiding Elder question, the usual inquiry having been made by Bishop George at the calling of his name, whether or not there were any objections to him, and the answer being given, "There are none," he instantly responded, "Yes, there are!"—showing the pamphlet. He would not allow his own character to pass till the leader in the opposition was present, when he replied to the charges in a manner so triumphant, that the parties retracted their accusation, confessed that they had done him an injury. He was elected to the General Conference, while they were not. Two of them afterward were elevated to the Bench, and were glad to stand on his platform; with his characteristic generosity he overlooked the past, and recognized them as true yoke-fellows in the work of the Lord.

When he advanced certain opinions in a sermon to which some took exception, he published his discourse without fear, and stood the ordeal of a searching criticism with no apparent concern for the result.

When some of the leaders in what was called the Reform movement persecuted him with pamphlets, he remained firm and unmoved—making no reply to the unscrupulous assailant who was foremost in the assault. Another, of a better mould, who was betrayed into some bitter expressions toward him, met him afterward at Tuscaloosa, retracted his harsh censures, and regretted that he had not remained with the Bishop on the old platform. Another of his old friends who had been alienated from him, visited him when he resided in Lebanon, Ohio, and expressed himself to the same effect. These were good and great men, and they did homage to the integrity of one whom, after all their minor differences, they esteemed and loved.

After his adherence to the South, when traduced by some of his former friends, he felt, indeed, the assaults; but he went forward in the even tenor of his way, as if nothing had happened, being fortified by the brazen bulwark of a good conscience.

Admitting that, being but a man, he may have been mistaken in some of his views and opinions, yet he was conscientious in their adoption, and as no bribe or sophistry could cajole him, so no power on earth could drive him from his position.

With all this he possessed a remarkably benevolent spirit. He was one of the most catholic Christians we ever knew. We have been in familiar intercourse with him for about a quarter of a century—staying with him weeks at a time, and our intimacy was of the most confidential character—and yet we cannot recall a single expression of bigotry, or uncharitableness, that ever fell from his lips. He was condescending and gentle to all, including little children and servants; he was sympathizing with all those who were in any trouble or affliction, whether of mind, body, or estate; and he was liberal to the full measure of his ability—if not really beyond it.

He was simple in his tastes, plain and frugal in his domestic habits—having this peculiarity, that he would eat no swine's flesh. He was very fond of horticulture, and spent considerable time, after his superannuation, and while his strength permitted, in his garden and orchard.

He was much devoted to reading, while his sight permitted. Though his education had not been a liberal one, yet by devoted study he acquired a vast amount of knowledge, which he turned to excellent account. He studied the ancient languages, and the great English classics, with which he retained a familiarity to the last. We have heard him quote long passages from Pope's Homer, with surprising correctness and force. The grandeur of the great Epic was in keeping with the lofty grade of his mind.

His patience under the severe afflictions of many years would put a Stoic to shame. He suffered incessantly from asthma, sciatica, erysipelas, and other severe and painful ailments, but he never complained, was always cheerful, and when others would have retired to their homes, he pursued his labors under the grievous embargoes of his sufferings, until accumulating years and infirmities forced him to desist. During what he seemed to consider his "inglorious ease," how often did he smell the battle afar off, and wish to mingle again in the thunder of the captives, and the shouting!

We ought perhaps to say that there was a courtliness, not to say, a courtliness, in his bearing and manner, in the pulpit, chair, parlor, stage-coach, or elsewhere, so that all who saw him, or had any intercourse with him, were peculiarly, and singularly, and lastingly impressed with it. When he was in England in 1841, before the strong man bowed himself, the English recognized a striking resemblance between him and the Duke of Wellington. When, by order of the British Conference, his likeness was drawn by the royal artist—a magnificent portrait, which, with the portraits of Bishops Asbury and McKendree, he has presented, with a portion of his library, to the Southern University—the likeness, while hanging in the artist's gallery, was taken by many to be that of the Duke himself. His tall and majestic form—finely chiseled features, with expression in every line—his slow and deliberate utterance, in the orotondo style—could not fail to arrest attention and fasten regard. How many thousands are there who have considered him a model Bishop—a model man!

The elements
So mixed in him, that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, This was a man!

Perhaps no one was ever more thoroughly attached to the Methodist system of doctrine and discipline, than Joshua Soule. He loved Methodism because of its grand Scriptural character, its aggressive power, and its diffusive spirit. He loved its simple theology, its sublime psalmody, its decent forms—for which, indeed, he was somewhat of a stickler—and its elevated standard of experimental and practical piety. His own personal religious character was formed upon it. And when he drew near his end, he rejoiced in the belief that it is renewing its youth, and going forth afresh like a strong man to run a race, and he bequeathed to the Church his dying testimony in favor of its truth and power! He told us especially and emphatically on his dying bed, that he considered the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, as the fairest and fullest exponent of Methodism now in existence. With what beautiful and edifying emphasis did he endorse the language of the sweet singer of our Israel, which we quoted to him—the swan-like notes with which Charles Wesley glided to the upper choir:

In age and feebleness extreme,
Who shall a helpless worm redeem?
Jesus, my only hope thou art.
Strength of my failing flesh and heart!
O, could I catch a smile from thee,
And drop into eternity!

He caught that smile; and so he dropped from our sight, crossed the flood, and joined his old companions, who had been long expecting his arrival; and we are left to exclaim again: "My father! my father! the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof!"

From the Nashville Christian Advocate.

FUNERAL OF BISHOP SOULE.

The funeral of Bishop Soule took place at McKendree Church, at 10 o'clock, A.M., Thursday, March 7. The cortege moved from his late residence to the church, while the tones of the tolling bell sounded solemn and slow. The corpse was met at the entrance of the church by the pastor, Dr. Young, who preceded it, reading the Sentences. After it was deposited on the altar, the organ and choir performed a solemn and appropriate dirge—which was succeeded by the Funeral Psalm, read by Dr. Sawrie, the Lesson by the Rev. C. C. Mayhew—part of the hymn, "Servant of God, well done," read by Bishop McTyeire—and an extemporaneous prayer by the Editor of the Christian Advocate. Bishop McTyeire then delivered a most excellent address, which we will not further characterize, as we have the pleasure of laying it before our readers. When we buried Mrs. Soule, the Bishop especially requested that no funeral sermon should be preached, as he did not much affect discourses of that sort; so in deference to his sentiment on the subject, an address was substituted for a sermon. A part of that grand hymn which the Bishop so much admired, ("Come, let us join our friends above,") and which he assisted in singing at the grave of his lamented wife, was then read by the Rev. Felix R. Hill, and sung with good effect. An appropriate prayer followed by the Rev. Mr. Bunting, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church. The congregation—including the colored people, who wept for their departed Bishop, as for a father—came forward and looked at the features of the venerable man, expressive even in death. The scene was truly solemn and impressive—the old church being suitably draped in mourning, while the tones of another dirge, "Thou art gone to the grave," rolled over the congregation, as the precious remains were removed to the hearse by the bearers—Wm. R. Elliston, Esq., Rev. John Morrow, Isaac Paul, Esq., Henry Hart, W. B. Ewing, M. Hamilton, Dr. W. H. Morgan, N. Hobson, Irby Morgan, and Prof. A. B. Stark. The cortege then moved to the old city cemetery, where they were deposited by the side of those of his wife and daughter—the Editor of the Christian Advocate reading the full Burial Service, substituting father for brother, in committing the body to the grave. There it rests in hope. Over it we would place an obelisk, not of marble, but of granite, the hard unstratified rock, symbolic of the unyielding firmness, stability, and grandeur of his character. The coffin, we may just say, was of rich rosewood—we would prefer solid live-oak—mounted with simple elegance, with a breast-plate bearing the inscription, "REV. JOSHUA SOULE, SENIOR BISHOP OF THE M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH." Our readers will be laid under obligation, as we are laid under obligation, to Bishop McTyeire for a copy of his address—which, it is proper to say, was introduced with a few remarks stating the reason, that a sermon was not preached. We may just say that our sketch of Bishop Soule was in type before the Bishop delivered his address, and as neither of us had seen the other's MS., there is some repetition which the editor would have avoided had he been aware of what the Bishop was preparing. However, the independent statements corroborate each other. In both cases they were derived from Bishop Soule's own lips. In delivering the address, Bishop McTyeire confined himself to the more strictly biographical passages.

Address of Bishop McTyeire.

George Soule came over in the Mayflower. From him descended all of that name in New England. George is a favorite name among them. They bear a striking family likeness. As a family, they have been fond of seafaring life.

Joshua Soule was born Aug. 1, 1781. His father, while he was an infant in his mother's arm, moved to Avon, a recent settlement on Sandy River. He remarked to a friend, inquiring on this point: "They say I was born in the State of Maine; but I was a Presiding Elder before Maine was erected into a State. I was born in the State of Massachusetts—providence, or district, of Maine."

His father had been for many years master of a merchant vessel, but later in life retired to and remained on his farm. He and his wife had been raised strict Presbyterians, and were rigid Calvinists. Joshua feared the Lord from his youth. Among his playmates and school-fellows he was called "the deacon." He never knew when he could not read. He read the Bible much, which, more than any preaching he heard, kept alive those awakenings of which he never knew the beginning. He never uttered an oath, and was ever horrified at such wickedness in others.

From about 1793 Jesse Lee, and other pioneer preachers in New England, had preached in the neighborhood. Lee formed the first circuit in those parts. It "extended from Hollowell to Sandy River," and was called "Readfield." There being no meeting-house of the Methodists then, and for a long time after, a private house, about a mile-and-a-half from the Soule residence, was both the preacher's home and chapel.

There Joshua attended, and heard Jesse Lee, Thomas Cope, (who fell miserably afterward,) the Hulls, (two brothers,) Philip Wagger, and their successors—and Methodist preachers succeeded each other oftener than once in two years, in those days. Joshua found in their preaching what he could assent to. His mind had revolted at Calvinism. The opposite doctrinal view and its experience suited him. He found it in his intuitions, drew it from the Bible, and had met with it in books.

One morning, before sunrise, he arose, and, as usual, went out to pray. For the first time, the witness of the Spirit was vouchsafed to him. The sun arose on his joy. A new heaven and a new earth smiled around. The peace that passeth all understanding overflowed his soul. This was a clear, specific date—an era in his spiritual life. But the time of his conversion was not. "Do you think you could come within three days of the exact time of justification?" "No," was his reply. "Within a month?" "Yes, nearer than that." "Within a week?" "Yes, within that space of time I could fix the gracious change."

He was now minded to join the Church, and felt inclination, and duty draw him to the Methodists. As a dutiful son—in his sixteenth year—he consulted his parents. His father was mortified, and tried to dissuade him from ever going among the Methodists again. As for his mother, she wept sore and remonstrated, declaring that if he took that step she regarded her son as ruined—she wished he had never heard of a Methodist.

Without acting hastily, he reviewed the matter, but abode in the same conclusion. Duty seemed to be clear, though the way was painful. His own account is:

"Before taking the final step, I had my father and mother apart, and laid the whole matter before them. With much respect, and many tears, I told them my convictions; and besides, requested them to name a single instance in which I had ever disobeyed them. But now I felt it my solemn duty to unite with the Methodist Church, and to gain their consent and approval would afford me more happiness than any thing else in the world."

His father's mortification grew toward indignation at the firm proposal; and as for his mother, she pleaded with him in tears, and used every entreaty to turn him aside.

"It cost me something," he continued, "to be a Methodist—I became one fully expecting to be an exile from my father's house. Twice in my life have I been brought to a stand. Twice have my faith and resolution been put to the test—but I decided in both cases—in the fear of God, and with reference to my accountability at his bar."

His heart was fixed, and the step was taken. Contrary to his expectations, his parents ceased to oppose him; but he went alone to his meetings. Scarcely any thing was ever said about them. He joined the Church, under Thomas Cope, at one of the week-day meetings, to the joy and surprise of the neighbors.

One day, as the plow-teams were resting at a turning-place, his father passing near him, Joshua said, "Father, a distinguished man is to preach this afternoon. Will you go and hear him?" The father answered, "No—I have heard one or two of them; they are all alike; enthusiasts, and don't know how to preach." The son looked up at him, and said plainly, but with deference, "Does your law judge a man before it hears him?" To which there was no answer.

But evidently the old Captain was put to thinking. He was a man of decision, and had taught his children to be so too—but first to be right.

The noon hour, the unhitching and feeding time, came. After dinner, quite to Joshua's surprise, his father ordered two horses to be saddled, and went with him to the meeting.

Cyrus Stebbins was there. Stebbins excelled himself that day. Great as were the issues pending, and the solicitude felt by one of his hearers, at least, the preacher rose equal to the occasion. His text was Ezek. xxxvii. 1-10. The elder Soule was all attention. There was power in the word. Preaching over, and the congregation dismissed, Joshua asked his father if he would allow him to introduce him to the minister. He assented, and to Joshua's equal astonishment and delight, asked the preacher to go home with him; and the invitation was accepted.

"Knowing my father's prejudices, I had my fears. He was a thoughtful man, and had read much in theology, and he considered the arguments for Calvinism unanswerable. Already I saw a controversy in store; so I made it convenient to drop behind as the company rode along, and have a word with the preacher, putting him on his guard, and let him know what was required and expected of him."

Supper over, the debate began in earnest; Joshua was not an inattentive listener. It was prolonged till one o'clock next morning. He trembled for Stebbins once or twice, but Stebbins brought forth truth unto victory. "With pleasure I saw my father hemmed in: he could go no farther. He was a candid man, and confessed himself foiled."

Prayer had been offered evening and morning, and, as the preacher was taking leave, the solitary young Methodist could hardly believe his own ears when he heard his father invite him to make his house a stopping-place, and, as it was larger than the one where meetings had been held, to move the circuit-preaching to his house! It was done. The notice was given, and the next appointment was a crowded one. Stebbins again was equal to the occasion. All the neighbors were there, and it was a day of the Son of man.

In less than six months after Joshua had joined the Methodists, his father and mother, and two older brothers, and two sisters, were numbered with them. His father was an official member till the day of his death.

So early did he begin to show those qualities that made him a leader among men, a captain of the Lord's host.

His call to preach was not attended by that long siege of conflict, reluctance, doubt, drawing back, and darkness, which is so common. He believed in the doctrine of a call to the ministry, by the Spirit. His account of his own case was brief: "The Lord called me to preach, and I went."

THE MILITARY BILL.

VETO MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT.—SCORCHING REVIEW OF THE PROPOSED MEASURE—IT IS IN CONFLICT WITH THE PLAINEST PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION—IT IS SUBVERSIVE OF THE PRINCIPLES OF OUR FATHERS—IT GIVES ABSOLUTE POWER TO AN IRRESPONSIBLE OFFICER—ALL LAW SUBVERSIVE TO HIM WILL.

The following is the message of the President of the United States, returning to the House of Representatives a bill "entitled an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States."

To the House of Representatives:

I have examined the bill to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States with the care and anxiety, which its transcendent importance is calculated to awaken. I am unable to give it my assent, for reasons so grave that I hope a statement of them may have some influence on the minds of the patriotic and enlightened, with whom the decision must ultimately rest. The bill places all the people of ten States therein named, under the absolute domination of military rulers, and the preamble undertakes to give reasons upon which it is justified. It declares that there exists in those States no legal government and adequate protection to life and property, and asserts the necessity of enforcing peace a good order within their limits.

It is true, as a matter of fact, that is not denied—that the States in question have each of them an actual government, with all the powers, executive, judicial and legislative, which properly belong to a free State; they are organized like the other States of the Union, and like them they make, administer, and execute the laws which concern their domestic affairs. An existing de facto government, exercising such functions as these, is itself the law of States upon all matters within its jurisdiction. To pronounce the supreme law making the power of an established State illegal, is to say that law itself is unlawful; and the provisions which these governments made for the preservation of the order, for the suppression of crime and the redress of private injuries, are in substance and principle the same as those which prevail in the Northern States and in other civilized countries. They certainly have not succeeded in preventing the commission of crime, nor has this been accomplished anywhere in the world. There, as well as elsewhere, offenders sometimes escape for want of vigorous prosecution, and occasionally perhaps by the inefficiency of courts or the prejudice of jurors.

It is undoubtedly true that those evils have much increased and aggravated the North and South, by the demoralizing influence of civil war, and by the rancorous feeling which the contest has engendered; but that those people are maintaining local governments for themselves, which habitually defeat the object of all government, and render their own lives and property insecure, is in itself utterly impracticable, and the avowment of the fact to that effect is not supported by any evidence which has come to my knowledge. All the information I have on that subject convinces me that the mass of the Southern people, and those who control the public acts, while they entertain diverse opinions of federal policy, are completely united in the effort to reorganize their society on a basis of peace, and restore mutual prosperity as rapidly, and as completely as their circumstances permit.

The bill, however, would seem to show upon its face that the establishment of peace and good order is not its real object. The fifth section declares that the preceding sections shall cease to operate in any State where certain events have happened. These are:

1st. The selection of delegates to a State convention by election, which negroes shall be allowed to vote.

2d. The formation of a State Constitution by the convention chosen.

3d. The insertion into the State Constitution of a provision which will secure the right of voting in all elections to negroes and white men as may not be disfranchised for rebellion.

4th. The submission of the Constitution for ratification to negroes and white men not disfranchised, and its actual ratification by the vote.

5th. The submission of the State Constitution to Congress for examination and actual approval of it by that body.

6th. The adoption of certain amendments to the federal Constitution by the vote of the legislature elected under the new Constitution.

7th. The adoption of said amendments by a sufficient number of other States to make it a part of the Constitution of the United States.

All of these conditions must be fulfilled before the people of any

these States can be relieved from the bondage of military domination; but when they are fulfilled, then the pains and penalties of the bill are to cease, no matter whether there be peace or order, or not, without reference to the security of life and property. The excuse given for the bill is not to be real. The military rule which it establishes is plainly to be used not for any purpose of order and for the prevention of crime, but solely as a means of coercing the people into the adoption of principles and measures to which it is known they are opposed, and upon which they have an undeniable right to exercise their own judgment.

I submit to Congress whether this measure is not, in its whole scope and object, without precedent and without authority, and in palpable conflict with the plainest provisions of the Constitution, and utterly destructive to those great principles of liberty and humanity for which our ancestors shed so much blood and expended so much treasure.

The ten States named in the bill are divided in five districts, and for each district an officer of the army, not below the rank of brigadier general, is to be appointed to rule over the people, and he is to be supported with an effective militia force to enable him to perform his duties, and the authorities, as defined by the third section of the bill, are to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress disorder and violence, and to punish or cause to be punished all disturbers of the public peace or criminals.

The power thus given to the commanding officer over all the people of each State is that of an absolute monarch. His mere will is to take the place of all the law of the States, and is the only rule applicable to the subject placed under his control, and that is completely displaced by the clause which declares all interference of the State authority to be null and void. He alone is permitted to determine what are the rights of person and property. He may protect them in such way as in his discretion may seem proper, and places at his free disposal, all the lands and goods in his district. He may distribute them without let or hindrance to whom he pleases, being bound by no State law; and there being no other law to regulate the subject, he may make a criminal code of his own, and he can make it as bloody as any recorded in history, or he can reserve the privilege of acting upon the impulse of his private passions in each case that arises.

He is bound by no rules of evidence. There is indeed no provision by which he is authorized or required to take evidence at all. Everything is a crime which he chooses to call so, and all persons are condemned whom he pronounces guilty. He is not bound to make any report or keep any record of his proceedings. He may arrest them, without accusation or proof of probable cause. If he gives them a trial before he inflicts the punishment, he gives of his grace, and mercy, not because he is commanded so to do. To a casual reader of the bill it might seem that some kind of a trial was secured to persons accused of crime; but such is not the case. The officer may locate civil tribunals to try offenders, but of course this does not require that he shall do so.

If any State or federal court presumes to exercise its legal jurisdiction by the trial of a malefactor, without his special permission, he can break it up and punish the judges and jurors as being themselves malefactors. He can save his friends from justice and despoil his enemies, contrary to justice. It is also provided that he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals, but this power is not commanded. To do it is merely permissive, and is to be used only when, in his judgment, it may be necessary for the trial of offenders. Even if the sentence of a commission were made a prerequisite to the punishment of a party, it would scarcely be the slightest restraint upon the officer, who has authority to organize it as he pleases, prescribes its mode of proceedings, appoints its members from his own subordinates, and reverses all its decisions.

Instead of mitigating the harshness of this single bill, such tribunals would be used more probably to divide the responsibility of making it more cruel or unjust. Several provisions dictated by the humanity of Congress have been inserted in the bill apparently to restrain power of the commanding officer, but it seems to me that they are of no avail for that purpose.

The fourth section provides that the trial shall not be unnecessarily delayed, but I think I have shown that the power is given to punish without trial, and if so, this provision is practically inoperative. Cruel or unusual punishment is not to be inflicted. But who is to decide what is cruel? and usually the words have acquired a legal meaning by long use in the courts. Can it be expected that military officers will understand it and follow a rule so purely technical, and not pertaining in the least degree to their profession? If not, then such officer may define cruelty according to his own temper, and if not usual, he will make it usual corporal punishment; the gags, the ball and chain and other almost insupportable forms of torture invented for military punishment; would be within the range of choice.

3d. The sentence of a commission is not to be executed, without its approval by the commander, if it affects life or liberty, and a sentence of death must be approved by the President. This applies to cases in which there has been a trial and sentence. I take it to mean under the bill that the military commander may condemn to death without form of trial by a military commission so that the life of the condemned may depend on the will of two men instead of one. It is plain that the authority here given to the military officer amounts to absolute despotism, but to make it still more unendurable the bill provides that it may be delegated to as many subordinates as he chooses to appoint, for it declares he shall punish or cause to be punished.

Such a power has not been wielded by any monarch in England for more than 500 years. In all that time, no people who speak the English language have borne such servitude. The whole population of the ten States; all persons of every color, sex and condition, and every stranger within their limits, are reduced to the most abject and degrading slavery; no master ever had a control so absolute over his slaves as this bill gives to military officers over both white and colored persons. It may be answered to this that officers of the army are too magnanimous, just and humane, to oppress and trample upon a subjugated people. I do not doubt that army officers are as well entitled to this confidence as any other class of men, but the history of the world has been written in vain if it does not teach us that unrestrained authority can never be safely trusted in human hands. It is almost sure, more or less, to be abused under any circumstances, and it has always resulted in gross tyranny where rulers, who are strangers to their subjects, come among them as the representatives of a distant power, and more especially when the power that sends them is unfriendly.

The governments closely resembling that here proposed, have been fully tried in Hungary and Poland; and the suffering endured by those people roused the sympathies of the entire world. It was tried in Ireland, and though at first tempered by the principles of English law, it gave birth to cruelties so atrocious, that they are never recounted. Without just indignation, the French convention armed its deputies with this power, and sent them to the southern departments of the republic. The massacres, murders, and other atrocities which they committed, show what the passions of the ablest men in the most civilized society will attempt to do when wholly unrestrained by law. The men of our race in every age have struggled to tie up the hands of the governments and keep them within the law, because our experience of all mankind taught them that rulers could not be relied on to concede those rights which they were not legally bound to respect.

The head of a great empire has sometimes governed with a mild sway, but kindness of an irresponsible officer never yields what the law does not extend. Between such a numerous people subjugated to his domination there can be nothing but enmity. He punishes them if they resist his authority; and if they submit to it he hates them for their civility.

I come now to a section which, if possible, is far more important. Have we the power to establish and carry into execution a measure like this? I answer, certainly not, if we derive our authority from the Constitution, and if we are bound by the limitations which it imposes.

This proposition is perfectly clear, that no branch of the federal government—executive, legislative or judicial—can have any just powers except those which it derives through and exercises under the organic law of the Union. Outside of the Constitution we have no legal authority more than private citizens, and within it we have only so much as that instrument gives us. That broad principle limits all our functions and applies to all subjects. It protects not only the citizens of the United States which are within the Union, but shields every human being who comes or is brought under our jurisdiction. We have no right to do in one place more than in another that which the Constitution says we shall not do at all. If, therefore, the Southern States were in truth out of the Union, we could not treat with their people, while the fundamental law forbids. Some people assume that the success of our arms in crushing the opposition which was made in some of the States to the execution of the federal laws, fed those States and all their people—the innocent as well as the guilty—to a condition of vassalage, and gave us a power over them which the Constitution does not bestow, or define or limit. No fallacy can be more transparent than this. Our victories subjected the insurgents to legal obedience—not to the yoke of an arbitrary despotism. When an absolute sovereign reduces his rebellious subjects, he may deal with them according to his pleasure, because he had that power before; but where a limited monarch puts down a rebellion, he must govern according to law.

If an insurrection were to take place in one of our States against the authority of the State government, and end in the overthrow of those who planned it, and would take away the rights of all the people of counties where it was avowed by a part of a majority of the population, could they for such a reason be wholly outlawed and deprived of their representation in the legislature? I have always contended that the government of the United States was sovereign within its constitutional sphere; that it executed the laws of the States themselves, by employing its coercive powers directly to individuals; and that it could put down the insurrection with the same effect as a State, and no other opposing doctrine. It is the worst heresy of those who advocate secession, and cannot be agreed to without admitting that hereby to be the right of insurrection.

Insurrection, rebellion and domestic violence were anticipated when the government was formed and the means of repelling and suppressing them were wisely provided for in the Constitution; but it was not thought necessary to declare that the States in which they occur should be expelled from the Union. Rebellions, which are invariably suppressed, occurred prior to that one to which these questions referred, but the States continued to exist, and the Union remained unbroken. In Massachusetts, Indiana, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New York, at different periods in our history violent and armed opposition to the United States was commenced on but the relations of these States with the federal government were not supposed to be interrupted or changed after the rebellious portions of their population were defeated and put down.

It is true that in these earlier cases there was no formal expression of a determination to withdraw from the Union, but it is also true that in the Southern States the ordinance of secession was treated by all the friends of the Union as mere nullities, and are now acknowledged to be so by the States themselves. If we admit that they had any force or validity, or that they did in fact take the States in which they were passed out of the Union, we sweep from under our feet all the grounds upon which we stand in justifying the use of the federal force to maintain the integrity of the government.

This is a bill passed by Congress in time of peace. There is not in any one of the States brought under its operation either war or insurrection. The laws of the State and of the federal government are in undisturbed and harmonious operation. The courts, State and federal, are open and in the full exercise of their proper authority; over every State comprised in the five military districts, life, liberty and happiness are secured by State and federal laws, and the national Constitution is everywhere in force and everywhere obeyed.

What then is the ground on which this bill proceeds? The title of the bill announces that it is intended for the efficient government of these ten States. It is recited by way of preamble that no legal State government, nor adequate protection for life or property exists in those States, and that peace and good order should thus be enforced. The first thing that arrests attention upon these recitals which prepare the way for martial law is this: That the only foundation upon which martial law can exist under our form of government, is not stated or so much as pretended.

Actual war, foreign invasion and domestic insurrection; none of these had the effect, and none of these in fact exist. It is not even recited that any sort of war or insurrection is threatened. Let us pause here to consider upon this question of constitutional law, and the power of Congress, and the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Ex parte Milligan. I will first quote from the opinion of the majority of court martial law, that it cannot arise from threatened invasion, the necessity must be actual and present, the invasion real such as effectually close the courts and depose the civil authorities.

We see that martial law comes in only when actual war closes courts and deposes civil authority; that this bill in time of peace makes martial law operate as though we were in actual war, and becomes the cause, instead of the consequence of the abrogation of civil authority. One more qualification. It follows from what has been said on this subject that there are occasions when martial law can be properly applied; if in foreign invasion our civil courts are actually closed, and it is impossible to administer justice according to law, then, on the theater of military operations.

Where war really prevails there is a necessity to furnish a substitute for the civil authority thus overthrown, to preserve the safety of the army and society, and as no power is left but the militia, it is allowed to govern by martial rule until the laws can have their free course. I now quote from the opinion of the minority of the court delivered by Chief Justice Chase—"We by no means assert that Congress can establish and apply the laws of war where no war has been declared or exists; where peace exists, the law of peace must prevail." This is sufficiently explicit.

Peace exists in all the territories to which this bill applies. It asserts a power in Congress—in time of peace, to set aside the laws of peace and substitute the laws of war. The minority, concurring with the majority, declares that Congress does not possess that power. Again, and if possible, more emphatically, the chief justice, with remarkable clearness and condensation sums up the whole matter as follows:

There are under the Constitution three kinds of military jurisdiction—one to be exercised both in peace and in war; another to be exercised in time of foreign war without the boundaries of the United States or in time of a rebellion and civil war within the States of the district occupied by rebels treated as belligerents; and a third to be exercised in time of an invasion or insurrection within the limits of the States maintaining adherence to the national government when public danger requires its exercise.

The first of these may be called jurisdiction under military law, and is found in acts of Congress prescribing rules and articles of war or otherwise providing for the government of the national forces.

The second may be distinguished as a military government, superseding as far as may be deemed expedient, local law, and exercised by a military commander under the direction of the President, with the express or implied sanction of Congress.

The third may be denominated martial law proper, and is called into action by Congress, or temporarily, when the action of Congress cannot be invited, and in case of justifying or existing peril by the President in times of insurrection or invasion of civil or foreign war in districts or localities when ordinary law no longer adequately insures public safety.

It will be observed, then, that of the three kinds of military jurisdiction which can be exercised under our Constitution, there is but one that can prevail in time of peace, and that is the code of laws enacted by Congress for the government of the national forces; that the body of the military law had no application to the citizens, nor even to the citizen soldier, enrolled in the militia, in time of peace.

But this bill is not a part of that government of military law, for that applies only to the soldier, and not the citizen, while contravise, the military law provided by this bill applies only to the citizen and not to the soldier. I need not say to the representatives of the American people that the Constitution forbids the exercise of judicial power in any way but one—that is, by the ordained established courts. It is equally well known that in all criminal cases a trial by jury is made indispensable by the express words of that instrument.

I will not enlarge on the inestimable value of the right thus secured to every freeman, or speak of the danger to public liberty in all parts of the country which must ensue from a denial of it anywhere, or upon any pretense. A very recent decision of the Supreme Court has traced the authority, indicated the dignity and made known the value of this privilege so clearly that nothing more is needed.

To what extent violence may be excused in time of war or public danger may admit of discussion, but we are providing now for a time of profound peace, when there is not an armed soldier within our borders, except those who are in the service of the government. Is it in such a condition that an act of Congress is proposed which, if carried out, will deny a trial by lawful courts and juries to nine millions of American citizens, and to their posterity for an indefinite period?

It seems to be scarcely possible that any one should seriously believe this consistent with a Constitution which declares in simple, plain, unambiguous language, that all persons shall have that right, and that no person shall ever in any case be deprived of it. The Constitution also forbids the arrest of citizens without a judicial warrant or foundation for probable cause. This bill authorizes arrest without warrant at the pleasure of a military commander.

The Constitution declares that no person shall be held for a capital or other infamous crime, unless on presentment by a grand jury. This bill holds every person not a soldier answerable for all crimes and all charges, without any presentment. The Constitution declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law.

This bill sets aside all process of law and makes the citizen answerable in his person and property to the will of one man, and to owe his life to the will of him. Finally, the Constitution declares that the privilege of the habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when in the case of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it; whereas, this bill declares martial law which, of itself, suspends this great writ in time of peace, and authorizes the military to make the arrest and gives to the prisoner only one privilege, and that is a trial without unnecessary delay.

He has no hope of release from custody except the hope, such as it is, of release by acquittal before a military commission. The United States are bound to guarantee to each State a republican form of government. Can it be pretended that this obligation is not palpably broken if we carry out a measure like this, which strips away every vestige of republican government in ten States, and puts the life, property, liberty and honor of all the people in each of them under the domination of a single person clothed with the authority?

The parliament of England, exercising the omnipotent power which it claimed, was accustomed to pass bills of attainder—that is to say, it would convict men of treason and other crimes by legislative enactment. The person accused had a hearing—sometimes a patient and fair one—but the federal party, who were prejudiced, prevailed instead of justice, and it often became necessary for parliament to acknowledge its error and reverse its own action.

The fathers of our country determined that no such thing should occur here. They withheld the power from Congress, and thus forbade its exercise by Congress; and they provided in the Constitution that no State should pass any bill of attainder. It is, therefore, impossible for any person in this country to be constitutionally convicted or punished for any crime for a legislative proceeding of any sort.

Nevertheless here is a bill of attainder against nine millions of people. It is based upon an accusation so vague as to be scarcely intelligible, and found to be true upon no creditable evidence. Not one of the nine millions was heard in his own defense. The representatives of the doomed parties were excluded from all participation in the trial. The conviction is to be followed by the most ignominious punishment ever inflicted on large masses of men. It disfranchises them by hundreds of thousands and degrades them all—even those who are not admitted to be guilty—from the rank of freedmen to the condition of slaves.

GEN. WASHINGTON'S LAST VOTE.—The farther of his country was conscientious in the discharge of every duty as a citizen, and never failed to vote. The last occasion of his doing so was in the spring of 1799, in the town of Alexandria. He died on the 11th of December following. The court-house of Fairfax county was then over the old market-house, and immediately fronting Gadsby's tavern. The entrance into it was by a slight flight of crazy steps on the outside, and while the election was progressing several thousands of persons being assembled around the polls—Washington drove up in his old and well-known family carriage. The crowd spontaneously gave way and made a lane for him to pass through as he approached the court house steps. A gentleman who was standing at Gadsby's door saw eight or ten good-looking men immediately spring forward and follow the general up the steps, in order to uphold and support him if necessary. According to the custom of that time, the five or six candidates were sitting on the bench, who rose in a body and bowed profoundly on the entrance of Washington. Very gracefully returning their salutation, the register of the polls said: "Well, general, how do you vote?" (It was then by clerk.) He looked a moment at the candidates and replied: "Gentlemen, I vote for measures, not men;" and having audibly pronounced his vote, he made another graceful bow, and retired. He was loudly cheered by the outside crowd on returning to his carriage.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT

APPLE CAKES.—Put three table-spoonfuls of flour in a vessel with two yolks of eggs, and one and a half gills of cold water, and mix. The two whites are beaten to a stiff froth, and mixed with the rest. Then cut apples into slices and put them in the batter, and drop into hot fat and fry. Sprinkle the slices of fruit with sugar before dipping them into the batter. Fritters must be served hot. Turn in a colander, and then place them in a dish and powder with sugar.

OYSTERS.—To fry oysters, turn them into a colander to let the juice drain off, and dip them into egg which is beaten, then roll them in bread crumbs, and press a little with the hand. Have the fat on the fire, ready to drop the oysters into, and they will be done in a few minutes. Beef suet is better than lard for frying them. Cut it in small pieces and melt it on a slow fire. Always strain it before using. To roast oysters in the shell, put them on the fire, and as soon as the shell opens serve them with a little butter. To broil oysters, dip them in the batter for fried oysters, and put them on the gridiron.

Mock Turtle Soup.—Take one ounce of butter, set it on the fire in a sauce pan. When melted add a small tablespoonful of flour. When turning brown add some broth. You may use either broth made of the calf's head or beef. To about a quart of broth add a few drops of burnt sugar to give it a color. Add liquor to flavor it according to taste, either Madeira wine or rum. When done cut the calf's head in dice and put it in the sauce pan.

BEEF A LA MODE.—Take a piece of beef from the round or the ribs, and lard it with salt pork. Always lard it contrariwise to the grain of the meat. Use a larding needle, and cut the strips of pork and run them in. If the beef is a very thick piece, lard on both sides. For a piece of eight pounds six hours are necessary for cooking. Put in a pan with a cover two ounces of butter, a few pieces of salt pork, a few slices of carrot, as much onion sliced, and then the meat, which weighs two and a half pounds. Put in another pan two carrots, sliced, to be served with the beef; set them on the fire, with cold water and a pinch of salt; boil gently, and drain when done. When the beef has been on fifteen minutes, add of cold water two or three tablespoonfuls. When the beef has boiled for twenty minutes add more water and turn the beef. Water is added from time to time. When brown on all sides (the beef is covered about two-thirds with water) put it in a slow oven for five hours. Add a bunch of seasoning, one bay leaf and one clove, and mix a little flour and water to thicken the gravy. When the beef is done turn the gravy from the meat over the carrots, through a strainer, and serve with beef. If you want to warm up the beef next day take a little butter and flour, and when melted, add some broth, and cut the meat into slices, and cover with the gravy. You may add a little mustard to taste.

CHICKEN STUFFED.—A small onion chopped fine is put on the fire, with one ounce of butter, and fried; when nearly done add some sausage meat, to which, if not seasoned, add salt and pepper and a little cinnamon, with one yolk of egg; stir rapidly, adding three or four mushroom or truffles, and one teaspoonful of parsley chopped fine; cook this for three minutes. Always open the skin on the top of the back to extract the crop; break the breast bone; fold the wings under, putting the stuffing in, and truss it. Then put it in the oven and bake.

HINTS ON BOILING.—Soak your beans for 24 hours before boiling. The only pieces of meat that should be boiled are a leg of mutton, an old turkey, cured beef or ham. You lose the best qualities of good beef in boiling. When we boil corned beef, put in into cold water and boil gently; always throw green vegetables in at the first boil of the water, but put other vegetables into cold water for boiling.

To BOIL A HAM.—Cut or scrape the black part from the ham, and if very salt, soak from six to eight hours; tie it in a cloth, and cover with cold water; add two bay-leaves, two carrots, sliced; four to six onions, four cloves and four cloves of garlic, six stalks of parsley, two of thyme, two stalks of celery, half a bottle of white wine. A handful of timothy hay improves it very much. For a ham of twelve pounds, from four to six hours is necessary for boiling; then take it out of the water and remove the small bone from the large end, then remove the rind and decorate with jelly, when done the bone is tender and easily bent.

Drop Cake.—Take one quart of flour, three teaspoonfuls baking powder, two eggs, half a cup of butter. Bake in cups or rings.

TO ADVERTISERS.

This paper has for many years been well known in this community as the very best advertising medium by which the business men of the city could bring their merchandise, trades, professions, and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood when it is remembered that the four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States in the Rio Grand, East Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all more or less active agents for the paper; and when it is also remembered that our paper circulates among a large class of people who seldom see any other New Orleans paper.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order. We have reason to believe that of all the monies forwarded to us by mail but a very small amount has failed to reach us: whenever the letters have been registered.

A DISTRICT MEETING of all the ministers and official members of the New Orleans District will be held on the fourth Saturday and Sunday in April in the Carondelet street Church in this city. We hope that all of our brethren from each appointment, or as many as possible, will be present. There will be at the same time a Monthly meeting of the Stewards. All in attendance will be entertained, as usual at our Conferences.

TOO WEIGHTY.

We never expected to see the day when this ADVOCATE would be charged with being "too weighty." But so it is—absolutely too strong. "Something lighter" is called for, on several sides. Having always had a tendency to lightness, and having suffered some self-reproach therefor, it will quite suit our natural taste to offer a repast after the more approved style of high life: consisting of considerable cut-glass, very white napkins in rings, a little clipped beef, some wafer-like slices of bread and butter, weak tea, a silver service, together with several well mounted sperm candles. Nothing we have ever met with is lighter.

But what then is to become of this drawer-full of strong sermons and good articles from correspondents, that we have been looking to as a never failing resource—which we brought into action, with a feeling of pride, not unlike that which an artilleryman had in his best piece? Well, we must hold on a while. We have noticed that people get tired, after a time, even of peach-cobblers. Then they will be glad enough to come back to "bacon and greens." This week it is too late to change: we insert several long, strong articles; but presently promise relief.

This word "weighty" may mean dull—it is supposable. For some readers reckon that great wisdom is far above them, and has an unsolved nebulous grandeur of its own, not to be penetrated. To solve it is to dissolve it. And some writers leave the reader to comprehend that which they in their own mental processes have never realized. They have too much conscious genius to go painfully over the track of their first glimpses, and hold themselves to the hard work of clearing up their own first hazy conceptions. They have hit sufficiently round the mark to give a tolerably correct notion of the unpierced centre. Sentences follow each other with some variation in language, but without progress in thought. Things that have no novelty are reproduced as regularly, and remorselessly, and promptly as the Phoenix.

To write a sentence on a clean sheet, and then to deliberately scratch it out, is something these idolaters cannot get their consent to do. They forget that every particular word of Goldsmith's "Traveler" was altered from its first cast, and yet the poem is immortal. To young writers we would give as a general rule, go over your MSS. three times. The first time, reduce it one-half, that is the language, preserving the thought. The second time, reduce that one-half again, still holding on to the thought. And the third and last time, with pain extreme, hold on to the thought, by all means, but reduce the volume again exactly one-half. It will then become Sibley and be re-read with pleasure by all others; as well as by the author. Unpracticed writers are very apt to fall into the mistake of our Irish milk-woman, who assured us that her cow gave milk too strong for use: but we insisted that the milk could be used without water.

In these telegraphic days people can stand a good deal of undiluted thought. The fear that new ideas, strong ideas, or beautiful ideas will be lost for want of display, is ill-founded. The labor spent upon a sentence in strengthening it, and in perfecting its parts, pays as well as any other labor. One single sentence can be traced back, from Daniel Webster, through Lord Erskine, to Milton. Each one contributed to it; no wonder that it fell from the lips of the great orator, like a thunderbolt in the Senate chamber. Bishop Bascom did his great work with single sentences—weighed, pointed, poised, and hurled, as if the whole effect was suspended upon one blow. His powerful sermons were simply an aggregation of sentences—every one a thirteen inch shell. It is difficult to see the connection between them, but each had its mission, and accomplished it. The call for "something lighter," will, we trust, prove of service to both, Editor, readers, and the contributors of the ADVOCATE.

CHANGE OF NAME AND LAY DELEGATION.

The following is the state of the vote on these questions:

Conferences.	Change of Name.	Lay Delegation.
Missouri	28	30
St. Louis	26	12
Arkansas	24	10
Louisville	35	31
Kentucky	45	7
West Virginia	51	2
Illinois	28	1
N. W. Texas	55	48
Tennessee	78	43
McDonough	69	3
North Carolina	37	8
Pacific	64	47
Virginia	18	42
Mobile	36	52
Mississippi	109	3
Georgia	57	10
Montgomery	23	23
West Texas	27	6
East Texas	102	7
Columbia	15	19
South Carolina	24	19
Louisiana	104	2
Florida	104	104
Baltimore	104	104

The following up of the above vote shows:

For change of name	1153
Against " "	418
Total vote on change of name	1571
Three-fourths of total vote	1178
Total vote for change of name	1153

Wants of being three-fourths
And therefore lost.

For Lay Representation

Against " "	400
Total vote on Lay Representation	1565
Three-fourths of total vote	1173
Total vote for Lay Representation	1165

Wants of being three-fourths
And therefore lost.

This supposes, of course, that our figures of the voting of the several Annual Conferences are correct.

The Secretary of the General Conference is, of course, the one competent to decide, as he only will have the certified statement of the vote from the several Secretaries of the Annual Conferences.

The Richmond Christian Advocate says:

On yesterday the Baltimore Conference voted on the question of changing the name of the Church, and lay delegation. The vote was 1165 in favor of both measures. It is thought that this vote, which would be increased a little by members who were absent coming in to the Conference room, will be sufficient to carry the question of lay delegations but we are still in doubt, and the decision cannot be definitely made until the official returns from all the Conferences are known. According to the returns we have seen, including all the Conferences except the Indian Mission, which is a very small body, the vote stands thus: the whole number of votes cast for change of name is 1,153, against it 418—aggregate 1,571—of which three-fourths is 1,178. For lay representation 1,161 votes have been cast, against it 400—aggregate 1,561, of which three-fourths is 1,173. So that, according to this calculation, the change of name lacks 26 votes of being a law, and lay representation lacks 0.

The "Baltimore Episcopal Methodist" says: "It will be seen that the Baltimore Conference voted unanimously for the change of name and for lay delegation. It is commonly believed that by this vote, lay delegation is secured, though the majority must be very small. It is feared, however, that the change has not been effected; but until the meeting of the Bishops at Nashville, the result cannot be certainly determined. In any event, the Baltimore Conference will have the satisfaction of knowing that they did what they could."

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The Chicago Tribune makes the following remarks, upon this important subject:

"The principal of no part of the funded debt, save the 10-40 five per cent loan, is specially made payable in gold. No provision is contained, either in the law or in the contract, as to the currency in which the other bonds are to be paid. [Laws of 1862, chapter 33, p. 23]. The principal, therefore, is payable in whichever class of legal tender the payer prefers. The whole funded debt, except the 'Sixes of 1861, and the 10-40s, becomes payable at the option of the Government, 'in or before the year 1873. As it matures it ought to be paid in greenbacks. The currency to make these payments could be obtained, if necessary, by a free use of the printing press. Government would then be in a condition to make its own terms. Two courses would be open: 'Either to fund the notes, at their current value in gold, into a bond-bearing, say 'five per cent interest; or to fund them, 'at their face value, into a three per cent bond, payable, principal as well as interest, in coin."

The liquidating the obligation of the government to the bondholders would relieve the country of taxation, excepting—for the interest for the 10-40 five per cent loan, which is specially made payable in gold, and for the amount necessary to defray its current expenses. The issue of 2000 millions of legal tender notes in addition to the present currency, would of course reduce it to one-third the present value. This was its rate when the debt was incurred. Gold was then worth 2 to 300. No one can complain of being promptly paid, a debt which was contracted during a war, when he gets back full as much as he gave. By this course, the Government will save the interest of 12 to 20 years, a sum fully equal to the principal, that is: two billions of dollars. Otherwise, the burden of the tax in this country, will for generations to come, equal that of Great Britain.

THE FLOODS.

By the extracts below from the Louisville, Memphis, and other papers, it will be seen that a disastrous overwhelming volume of water is coming down the great river. It is represented as equal in the Ohio, and the Tennessee, Cumberland, and other large tributaries, to any previous rise, bearing before it the strongest levees that have been made since the war.

In this prospect, our friends who are planting in the swamplands of the lower Mississippi should prepare the best they can for preserving their cattle, fences, outhouses, and food. The Editor of the Planter's Banner suggests that nothing better can be done than to select a piece of land likely to be covered with water, prepare it with a good ploughing, and plant it in rice. No better crop can be put in, in any event. Land should be selected, which will be covered to the least depth. We hope that many will act promptly upon this practical suggestion. Plant in drills, and then the labor need not be lost, if the water does not come. If it does, so soon as it disappears, the farmer will see the fruit of his wise precaution, in the safest and the most valuable crop that can be cultivated in lower Louisiana.

The present flood promises to exceed all the floods we have had since 1832, both in the height of water and the amount of destruction wrought by the resistless tide. The vast expanse of water, spread out as it is like a sea, and rushing forward with impetuous current, fills one with awe as he contemplates with immensity, and the question is asked on all sides, "are we all to be wasted away?"

From Louisville to Cairo is one vast sheet of water, in many places full thirty miles wide. Houses have been overturned and swept away; the dwellers in the low lands have been driven by the encroaching torrent to the hills for refuge; cattle, horses, sheep, and hogs have been drowned because they could not escape the flood; hundreds of thousands of bushels of grain and potatoes have been washed away or so badly damaged as to be of no value; stacks of hay and oats and wheat have been swept off; and still the tide increases in volume and destructiveness. — New Albany Ledger, March 13.

The Louisville Courier of the 13th says:

The city, seen from the river, presents a curious appearance. The water is in the second stories of most of the houses along the levee, while Shippingsport, the Point and other localities are entirely submerged, and their positions only to be defined by the rapidly flowing stream.

The Evansville (Ind) Journal, of the 13th, says:

All the low lands on both sides of the river are an illimitable waste of water, which sweeps from near Newberg to West Franklin, so deep that were it not for the timber, the largest class of boats could run straight across all points. At Shawneetown and Caseyville the river is now higher than ever before known. Shawneetown is perfectly inundated, and a steamboat of medium size, such as the Armada, for instance, could run through the main street of the village. From the Wabash to Cairo the river is higher than in 1832, and the suffering along the borders is very considerable.

Green river is unusually high, and much property has been destroyed. A tobacco warehouse at Ramsey was washed away, and another at Calhoun has been undermined and caved in.

The Memphis Avalanche has the following:

Business on the wharf is much restricted on account of the weather and mud. The Vicksburg trade is cut off on account of the overflow. The Dan. Able found only two dry landings between here and Vicksburg. The new levees are broken and washed away at Ashton, Miller's Bend and Grand Lake; the latter is broken in three places, and was considered one of the finest levees ever built. Friar's point and Helena are inundated, and the denizens are forced to seek refuge on flatboats and water crafts of various descriptions. The lower country is partially destroyed; fences, cattle and houses have been swept away by the angry current. Hopefield, opposite here, is also under water. The river is up to the high-water mark of 1862, and keeps no longer than has been known for years. The river came to a stand yesterday, but we much fear the Ohio and Cumberland also will have a tendency to keep the river at high tide.

GRATITUDE—POLITICAL, ECOLOGICAL, AND MIXED.

BOTTS TO CHARLES SUMNER.—

The following is the letter from Mr. Botts, lately read by Senator Sumner, in support of his proposition to make additional demands on the Southern States. Mr. Botts, it seems, was particularly gushing in his thanks to Mr. Sumner for devising new tortures for the people of Virginia:

Richmond, March 8, 1867.

My Dear Sir—Thank you, Mr. Sumner, thank you with all my heart, not only for myself, but in behalf of every Union man in this State, for your effort to protect the loyal men of the South, not one of whom have I yet seen or heard of that does not protest against this Sherman bill, as it is called, which does not rise to the dignity of an abortion, but is what, in medical terms, is called a "false conception." Kelly's resolution, offered in the House, mends the matter a good deal; but let me beseech you not only to give us registration, but a vote by close ballot, instead of viva voce, as we have it in this State. Unless this is changed we cannot bring one-fourth of the loyal white vote to the polls for fear of the social effect on themselves and families, and this effect also on their business pursuits. I suppose it would hardly be worth trying to limit the vote on the election of members to the convention and on the adoption of the Constitution to those who can take the congressional test-oath. Why should we run the risk of letting the rebels out-vote us on either?

I am, respectfully and truly, yours in haste,

JOHN MINOR NOTTS.

[From the Western Christian Advocate.]

The convictions of loyal men in the South in respect to the bill, are fully reflected by the action of our own little Mission Conference last week, in session at Charleston, S. C., under the presidency of Bishop Scott. The Speaker of the House on Thursday received from it the following dispatch:

CHARLESTON, March 4th.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress:

The members of the South Carolina Mission Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church, now in session, send greeting to Congress, and devout thanksgiving to Almighty God, for the passage of a reconstruction bill to protect in their rights all classes in the South. [Signed] LEVI SCOTT, President. A. WEBSTER, Secretary.

It may seem excessive, but to these we add the gentle breathings of the Editor of the New Orleans (Northern) Advocate:

THE NEW ERA.—Loyal men breathe freer. The long night of their social and political ostracism is past. The rays of freedom's dawn have touched the mountain tops. The patriot's patience is rewarded, his sentiments are honored, his fidelity is vindicated. The victories of the sword are assured by the law of the land. Congress has acted nobly, wisely, and the Secretary of State has affixed the seal of his office to the law by which four millions of people are elevated to the rights of citizenship. Such grand events are centennial; they require centuries of preparation. They are the indices of the triumphal march of civilization; they are the corners of history, around which progress sweeps in her onward course.

With what spirit should we hail such glorious events? Certainly neither with pride, nor haughtiness nor contempt for others, but rather with that gratitude which bespeaks dependence on God; with that meekness, which ever becomes true greatness; with that kindness, which "works no ill to his neighbor." Decisive for the right, steadily pursue it; strong in convictions of duty, boldly avow them; conscious of success, meekly wear the honors Heaven hath awarded.

We cannot but think that these meek ones greatly mistake their mercies. They have always had a constitutional inclination to get out of the way of danger, which renders superfluous any particular security extended to them by the Military Reconstruction Bill. We have no greater notion of safety, than the immediate atmosphere of these persons. It is in the bosom of parties, who were too religious themselves to go down into the battle, that the fires of an unquenchable hostility still burn. They furnish the fuel for keeping up the spirit of strife. They profess alarm before danger, and gratitude before deliverance—"Breathe freer," indeed! The only danger we can imagine the birly, florid brother to have ever been in is from an apoplexy.

POPULAR SCIENCE.—The Scientific American Greatly Enlarged.

The widely-circulated and popular Journal of the industrial Arts and Sciences entered its twenty-second year on the 1st of January last. The Publishers have enlarged it to the size of the most costly Scientific Journals of Great Britain, without, however, increasing the subscription price.

The engravings of New Inventions, Tools, Implements for the Farm, Workshop and Household are very numerous, and are splendidly executed by the best artists in the world. This feature of the paper is very striking, and has won the praise of the united press of this country and Europe.

Another feature peculiar to the Scientific American is the Official publication of every Patent granted by the Government Patent Office. Each number contains the weekly issue of Patent Claims, with copious notices of new inventions, together with Reviews of Foreign Inventions and Discoveries in every department of Science.

The numbers for a year make up a splendidly illustrated volume of 832 pages. Terms: $3 per annum; $1 50 for six months; $1 for four months; Clubs of ten and upward, $2 50 each; Canadian subscribers, $3 25 per annum, always in advance. Specimen numbers sent free; also, a pamphlet of advice to inventors. Address

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE QUARTERLY CONFERENCE, OF RICHLAND CIRCUIT, YAZOO DISTRICT.

WHEREAS, a lax morality hangs like a cloud over our moral sky, and many who "did run well for a season, are now halting by the way; and whereas, we believe "Holiness to the Lord," to be the only safe watch-word for a "soldier of the cross;" and whereas, we further believe, that the general use now made of ardent spirits, as a beverage, in and out of the church, and a prevalent spirit of individual selfishness abroad in the land, are two very great hindrances to the spiritual growth and development of the church; therefore,

Resolved 1. That we, as official members in the church of God, will earnestly and prayerfully seek higher attainments in divine life, and urge our brethren to do likewise.

Resolved 2. That we will exert ourselves by all means legitimate thereto, to heal the membership of the vice of dram-drinking, as well as the vile practice of affording intoxicating liquors, to the masses gratis or for pay.

Resolved 3. That we will practice ourselves, and commend to our brethren hereafter, a habit of contributing more liberally to the support of God's cause and ministry.

Resolved 4. That our Presiding Elder be requested to present the foregoing preamble and resolutions, to the various Quarterly Conferences of his District, for their consideration and adoption; and that he preach, or cause to be preached, a discourse in each charge, on each of the subjects embraced in these resolutions.

FROM OTHER CHURCHES.

NORTHERN METHODIST.
PROGRESSIVE.—The ministers of the New York District of the New York Conference recently held a meeting to consider the question, "Who shall we have for our presiding elder the next four years" in place of Rev. Morris D. C. Crawford, the present worthy incumbent. After an earnest canvassing on the part of thirty-five ministers present, they unanimously agreed to name one man to the appointing power, who, it is thought, will probably be the appointee of the Presiding Bishop. This is a new feature in the itinerancy, but the sun rises in the East.—Pittsburgh Adv.

The Rutland Herald says: "The venerable Rev. Daniel Tinkham, of White Creek, N. Y., was found dead at his residence on Sabbath morning. His age was eighty-four years, and he had been a preacher of the Gospel over half a century."

A summary of the pastoral labors of Rev. Asa Brouson, who lately died at Fall River, includes 8,000 sermons, 1,500 baptisms, 1,000 marriages and 3,000 funerals.

PRESBYTERIAN.
 Rev. Dr. Guthrie.—The Presbyterian says: "Through a friend we learn that the Commission of the Free Church of Scotland has appointed the Rev. Thomas Guthrie, D.D., a delegate to the Presbyterian bodies of America, and that he has accepted the appointment, and expects to sail for this country some time in the month of April."

CONGREGATIONAL.
 A LANDMARK TO BE REMOVED.—Dr. Cheever's church, corner of Broad way and Fifteenth streets, New York, has been sold, and the ground leased for twenty-one years to Tiffany & Co., jewelers. They intend to build a large fire-proof store. The church will probably be rebuilt upon.

UNIVERSALIST.
 UNIVERSALISM.—Boston has been the "hub" and headquarters of Universalism, and almost every other city opposed to the truth. Here Ballou, Dean and Streeter, as well as Murray, the founder of the order flourished. It had its day, and then began a decline that has affected all the societies of its name in all New England. The society of fifty years standing, in Portland has disbanded, and no organization arises to take its place. In Boston, the old Murray society, the mother of them all, has gone down, and the house is occupied as a Baptist Bethel. The church of Mr. Deane, Murray's colleague, has passed into other hands, and the society has ceased to exist. Below Dover street, which embraces all Cosins there is, but one society of this sect, though at one time it numbered five.—Presbyterian

FOREIGN.
 The Archbishop of Rennes thinks the Papacy will stand for ages yet, because the Virgin has a debt to pay per Pius, on account of his having kept her immaculate conception an article of faith. His language is, "The divine Mary conceived without sin, has become the mother of the pontiff. She will be faithful to her obligation."
 The universal Israelite Alliance met in Paris on the 20th of November, the delegations making a body of about 4,500. They are said to represent about 7,000,000, scattered all the earth. In some portions, as in Persia, the Jews are greatly persecuted, but their general condition, socially and physically, throughout the world is far better than it was a few centuries ago.

Sixteen missionary societies are springing on the western coast of Asia, of which six are British, an American, two German and West Indian.

BALTIMORE CONFERENCE adjourned on Wednesday, March 13th. We notice that Rev. L. D. Huston is stationed in the city, at Winans chapel. We extract from the "Episcopal Methodist":

The Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, adjourned to-day. The session has been one of remarkable harmony. Matters of great interest were considered and passed without excitement or lengthened debate. So perfect was the unanimity of the body, that the two questions of lay delegation and the change of the name of the Church were adopted without discussion, and without a negative vote. A unanimous vote of one hundred and seven names was cast in favor of each measure. The Sabbath School interest was considered, and a convention to further this enterprise of the Church was called to meet in the city during the year. Randolph Macon College, Mecklenburg County, Va., was taken, conjointly with the Virginia Conference, under the patronage of this body. Missionary meetings were held during the session, in Trinity and Chatsworth Methodist churches, and in the Baptist church, of which Dr. Williams is pastor. The amount raised will approximate two thousand dollars. The day preceding the close of Conference was devoted to funeral services, on the occasion of the death of Bishop Soule. Dr. Lovick Pierce preached one of his great sermons on the occasion, and was followed by Dr. A. L. P. Green, who gave an inimitable sketch of the personal appearance and character of the Bishop, as well as the circumstances of his last sickness. The sublime death of the Bishop, as detailed by Dr. Green, moved every heart, and the sermon and the sketch that followed it, will long live in the memory of the large assembly who were present. At the close of Conference, the usual complimentary resolutions were passed, but with more than the usual feeling. Bishop Pierce came in largely for a share in the kind wishes of the brethren, as did the Ven. Bishop Early and Bishop Doggett. Dr. Lovick Pierce, whose sweet and fatherly spirit won all hearts, bore away with him expressions of sincerest regard. The session of the Conference closed with the same harmony which had marked its proceedings. Its moral influence in the community was felt daily, and large crowds of visitors bore continual testimony to the interest excited in the community.

The increase during the year is over seven thousand. Rev. S. S. Roszel, Rev. J. Poissal, Rev. S. Register, and Rev. J. Landstreet were appointed Trustees of Randolph Macon College. C. H. H.

The Order of Gen. Sheridan.

The expected order of the District Commander, appointed under the military bill for the government and reorganization of this State and Texas, will be found below. It declares that existing civil functions will be continued, but simply as provisional, and subject to removal, should their conduct in office not comport with the Military Commander's views of their duty. Again, as it was announced by Gen. Banks, when he was about to "reorganize" the State under the administration of President Lincoln, "the supreme law of the State is martial law."

HEADQUARTERS 5TH MILITARY DISTRICT.
 N. O. La., March 19, 1867.
 General Order No. 1.

1. The act of Congress entitled "an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," having been officially transmitted to the undersigned in an order from the Headquarters of the Army, which assigns him to the command of the Fifth Military District created by that act, consisting of the States of Louisiana and Texas, he hereby assumes command of the same.

2. According to the provisions of the 6th section of the act of Congress above cited, the present State and Municipal governments in the States of Louisiana and Texas are hereby declared to be provisional only, and subject to be abolished, modified, controlled or superseded.

3. No general removals from office will be made, unless the present incumbents fail to carry out the provisions of the law, or impede the reorganization, or unless a delay in reorganizing should necessitate a change. Pending the reorganization, it is desirable and intended to create as little disturbance in the machinery of the various branches of the Provisional Governments as possible, consistent with the law of Congress and its successful execution; but this condition is dependent upon the disposition shown by the people, and upon the length of time required for reorganization.

4. The States of Louisiana and Texas will retain their present military designations, viz: "District of Louisiana" and "District of Texas." The officers in command of each will continue to exercise all their military powers and duties as heretofore.

fore, and will, in addition, carry out all the provisions of the law within their respective commands, except those which specifically require the action of the Military District Commander, and except in cases of removals from, and appointment to, office.

 Major Gen. Commanding.

 Existing State Organization and the Sherman Bill.

THE AUTHOR'S EXPLANATION OF THE LAW.
 As some persons are impressed with the belief that the Sherman bill overthrows existing State governments, we copy for general information, the following telegraphic correspondence from the Greenville (Ala.) Advocate:

To Hon. John Sherman, Senator of the United States:
 Can officers of the State, ineligible under the constitutional amendment, now perform their functions under your bill, etc.?

To Reaj. F. Porter: BENJ. F. PORTER.
 Your State officers can still perform their functions until superseded by State Governments, organized under the new law.

JOHN SHERMAN.
LATEST NEWS.

GALVESTON, March 21.—Rio Grande dates of the 16th inst. from the Mexican seat of war to the 10th inst., being eleven days later, state that a battle had been fought at Catabualpan. It appears to have been between a small part of the forces, not more than 1500 being engaged on either side. Maximilian took part in person. Accounts of the result differ, but appearances are that Maximilian was victorious. Porfirio Diaz is about to besiege the capital. A general battle is impending.

Juarez will shortly order the French residents to leave the country or be naturalized. The general appearances are more favorable to Maximilian's success.

Santa Anna proposes to join him. Maximilian is expected daily at Matamoros with a large army. There are only about 1000 Mexican troops in the city. The citizens are wild with excitement. Business is entirely suspended in consequence of the citizens being under arms. Dispatches received there report the ports of Tuxpan and Nautla blockaded by the imperialists.

NEW YORK, March 20.—The stock market is excited and lower. Five-twentieths of '64, coupons, 107½; ditto of '65 107½; new issue 107½; 10-40's coupons, 97½; 7-30's, first series, 106, other series 105½; Missouri State sixes 71½; money 6 to 7 per cent.; gold closed stronger at 134½; governments steady; stock market heavy at the last open board and lower after call.

NASHVILLE, March 21.—The Supreme Court to-day rendered a decision sustaining the franchise law adopted at the last session of the legislature.

NEWBURN, N. C., March 21.—Major George Hughes, the Southern candidate for State senator, was elected unanimously. Negroes voted.

BALTIMORE, March 21.—The Maryland Senate has appropriated $100,000 for the relief of the poor of the South.

OBITUARIES.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

Adopted by the first Quarterly Conference for the Black's Bend Circuit, Montgomery Conference, for 1867.

WHEREAS, The great Head of the Church, has moved from our midst to his reward, the Rev. H. B. Farish, who, from his youth was a preacher in our Church, and a member of this Quarterly Conference, from the formation of this Circuit, therefore,

Resolved, 1st. That while we bow submissively to this dispensation, and while we rejoice in the assurance, that his death was triumphant, and his end was peace, we feel that we have suffered a great loss, and his memory is precious to us.

Resolved 2nd. That, by this providence we are admonished to set our houses in order, that we may be ready when the Master calls for us.

Resolved 3rd. That, we sympathize deeply with his family in their sad bereavement.

Resolved 4th. That, a copy of these resolutions be presented to the family, and that they be published in the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE in New Orleans, and also in the Walden Times.

ANSON WEST, P. E.
 J. P. JONES, Sec.

The Christian faded to bloom again. So has faded one of the brightest jewels of Tallahassee Circuit. SISTER MARTHA M. WILLIAMS, wife of Bro. Geo. W. Williams, (who was born Jan. 22, 1847,) breathed her last on the evening of the 16th of Feb. 1867. Sister W. found peace, and joined the M. E. Church, South, during the year 1863. From that time until the day of her death, she proved by her walk and conversation that she was the "salt of the earth, and the light of the world." She was a model Christian, for her christian life was a consistent one.

Her deep piety, lovely disposition, and winning manners, always commanded the love and respect of all who knew her. Her husband led her to the marriage altar only twelve months prior to her death. Though she was not able to articulate a word for several hours before she died, yet her pious walk, since her conversion is satisfactory evidence of her safe retreat from earth to heaven. We thank God, for that grace that enables us to believe, "that all things work together for good to them that love God." While we weep, we can but say, "Thy will, O God, be done and not ours." And though this is a sad affliction to the surviving relatives, they can look forward with bright anticipation to the resurrection morn, when she, with all the dead in Christ, will come forth to fade no more.

LATEST FASHIONS.
Call for
J. W. BRADLEY'S
DUPLIX ELLIPTICAL
[Or, Double Spring]

SKIRT!

THEY WILL NOT BEND OR BREAK
Like the Single Spring, but will preserve their perfect and graceful shape when three or four ordinary Skirts are worn as one—because are the CHEAPEST.

Each Hoop is made by braiding two springs together, edge to edge, forming the STRONGEST, most FLEXIBLE, and still the LIGHTEST Hoop made.

In fact, for promenade, or the house, or the church, the theatre, or for crowded assemblies, railroad cars, carriages, etc., they are superior to all others, affording COMFORT TO THE WEARER, with that ELEGANCE OF SHAPE which wins favor with all, and has made the "DUPLIX ELLIPTICAL"

The Standard Skirt of the Fashionable World. For misses and young ladies they are superior to all others.

For Sale Everywhere.
Manufactured exclusively by the owners of the Patent,
WESTS, BRADLEY & CARY,
91 Chambers, 79 and 81 Beade sts, New York.

CAUTION.
The Duplex Skirt will admit a pin being run through the centre of each Hoop, thereby proving there are TWO SPRINGS braided together therein, which is the secret of their remarkable STRENGTH and FLEXIBILITY—a combination not possessed by any SINGLE SPRING Skirt.

The red ink stamp, viz: "J. W. BRADLEY'S Duplex Elliptical Springs," will be found upon the waistband of every Skirt; none other are genuine.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE

The next Spring Session of this well known institution will commence on the 10th day of February, 1867. It is owned and controlled by the Louisiana Conference, is thoroughly organized, and in the enjoyment of an extensive patronage. The institution can present greater advantages in the way of a healthy situation, refined society, commodious buildings, thorough instruction, efficient government, and reasonable charges.

CENTENARY COLLEGE,

JACKSON, Louisiana,
was established by the State of Louisiana in 1855, and transferred to the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1845. It is now under the joint patronage of the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences.

The College exercises were necessarily suspended during the war; but were regularly resumed, after reorganization, on the first Monday in October, 1865. The approaching session will open on the first Monday of October next.

Tuition, $75 per annum, payable semi-annually, in advance.
Boarding can be obtained at from $20 to $25 per month.

The Buildings, Libraries, Apparatus, Laboratory and Society Halls, the location in point of beauty, health, ease of access and good society, all unsurpassed by those of any institution in the Southern States.

The Board and Faculty promise the public that nothing shall be wanting on their part to secure the thorough education of the young men committed to their care, in both Preparatory and Collegiate Departments.

The old students, alumni, and friends of the institution, are requested to give publicity to the full reorganization and opening of the College, as stated above.

W. H. WATKINS, President.

SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY,

GREENSBORO, ALA.
The exercises of this institution will be resumed on the first Wednesday in October next. Instruction will be given in the Schools of Ancient and Modern Languages, Mathematics, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Chemistry, Natural Philosophy, and Biblical Literature. Civil Engineering and Analytical Chemistry will also be taught.

TERMS:
Tuition fees per term.....$40 00
Incidental fee.....5 00
Board can be obtained at $20 to $25 per month, in advance.
W. M. WIGHTMAN, Chancellor

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE AT

BATON ROUGE.
The fifth session of this school will begin on Wednesday, 31 October, 1867.

The object of the school has ever been to afford a good classical and practical education, or a complete preparation for any stage of a College or University course.

TERMS: Tuition and board, per month, $40.—Payable $200 in advance, balance on the 1st of March.

Every student who enters the school is expected to remain to the close of the session in July, and will be held liable for the bills in all cases, unless previously released shall compel his removal.

Pupils are required to furnish their own bed clothing, towels, wash-basin, mosquito-bar, etc. at Baton Rouge, or Rev. J. C. Keener, D.D., New Orleans, La.

As the number of students is limited, it is earnestly requested that application be made as soon as possible.

We respectfully call the attention of all parties desirous of encouraging HOME MANUFACTURES to the various styles of

LADIES' SUPERIOR CALF WALKING SHOES AND DRESS BOOTEES, MISSES' HEAVY SCHOOL SHOES, CHILDREN'S STRONG SHOES AND MEN'S AND BOYS' CALF, AND KIP BROGANS.

Which we are now daily receiving from our Factory. These goods are made here, of Louisiana Tanned Leather, and we flatter ourselves fully demonstrate that manufacturing in the South is no longer an experiment, but with the proper encouragement from all who are interested in such enterprises, we promise better stock, more faithful workmanship and superior goods every way, to any Eastern goods, and for the same class of work at as low prices.

We aim to manufacture all the goods we sell, and to that end we are turning out new styles every week.

A trial for this work is cordially solicited from Merchants, Planters, and all persons requiring good Shoes.

Hallelujahs ringing,
And all heaven rejoice.

Mr. Editor: Do not Christian people err when they settle down into the idea that religion is something which is calculated only to arouse the sympathies, and to excite the emotions of the human soul? We think that all who have read the Scriptures carefully, must give an affirmative answer to this question. We are inclined to believe, that this false and imperfect view of the design of religion, is on account of the apathy that prevails to such a large extent in the church. The man, who considers religion as mere feeling, is satisfied to devour, without digesting the truths of religion; to receive, without giving out any of its favors. Now, we think, this habit unfits a man for the noblest and most beautiful sphere of Christian life; and that Christian action. Does not the untimorous gormandizer unfit himself for any labor that requires rapid and earnest physical action? Does not the book-worm, who devours whole cargoes of newspapers, books, and magazines, dissipate his mental power, and hinder its healthy development? So we think the man who is always receiving spiritual lessons without acting upon them, unfits himself for the best Christian life. The highest Christian life is to give, as well as to receive. It is not only to be passive under the influences of God's grace, but also to be active under the constraining power of Christ's love. No matter what may be a man's feelings; no matter how many pleasant emotions may bubble up in his soul; no matter from what depths of the heart his joy may issue, he does not reach the highest Christian life without implicitly obeying the commands of the Father. His power to accomplish all depends upon his obedience to the precepts of the gospel, and not upon the feelings originated in his heart by those precepts. And this arduous effort to do good to all—especially to them that are in the household of faith," constitutes the highest Christian life, and the success of the effort depends, upon what a man feels, but upon what he does, and how he does it. It is a lamentable fact, that Christians not only live behind their duties but far below their privileges, hence, they need to be "stirred up to both."

now, if the brightest and noblest christian life, consist in energetic christian action for the cause of we would urge upon all Christians, the duty and the high privilege of putting forth individual effort to insure the progress of that cause. It is a great misfortune, when an individual suffers his individuality to be merged and lost in the body of the Church. It is a mistake to suppose that the Church, as a body, can do more than the individual member thereof. The reverse is the fact. But some people have fallen into this error, and come to the conclusion that all the work for the cause of Christ ought to be done by the Church in its corporate capacity. If Christians should settle down to this notion, the progress of the Gospel would be very effectually stopped. Corporate bodies, as such, never do accomplish anything. It is the individual exertion of every one engaged in the work, that propels the scheme. And so it is in the Church. The progress of the cause of Christ is suspended upon the personal effort of each member of his church. And when any single member merges his identity in the body of the church, and divests himself of his individuality in working for the church, the church loses that much power in action. The great lesson of the New Testament, in regard to Christian action, is, that it must be a personal effort. And as each one is required to work, so we think each one has a certain "gift," which qualifies him for working in some department of the Christian enterprise. Does not the Apostle Peter teach this, when he says: "As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God?" We do not suppose that any one hath received the same "gift," or in the same degree. Paul tells us that, "there are diversities of gifts," and our Saviour has taught us, in the "Parable of the Talents," that God has distributed his "gifts" to men "according to their several ability," to use and improve the same. And we see here, that there is, in the Divine Economy, a "division of labor," and each class is required to work, and work only in its own proper department. When any one passes over the boundaries of his own proper sphere, he not only leaves his own place vacant behind him, but he enters a department where the work is not adapted to his capacity, and for which he is not qualified. And such action, instead of conferring a benefit, always works mischief, because it is in opposition to that beautiful harmony which characterizes all the works of God, in nature, and in grace. To one is given the "word of wisdom," to another, "the word of knowledge." One has received the "gift of tongues," another, "the interpretation of tongues." There are "diversities of gifts;" "diversities of administrations," and "diversities of operations." And, says the Apostle, "all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as He will." We think the distribution of different gifts, and of the same gifts in different degrees, to different persons, shows the wisdom of God in the arrangements of the plan of salvation. The human mind is so constituted, and society is so constructed, that the influences which move one class to act, have no perceptible effect upon another class. And, hence, says Paul, "God hath set one in the church, first, Apostles; secondarily, Prophets; thirdly, teachers; after that, Miracles; then gifts of healings; helps, governments, diversities of tongues;" that every different class of humanity may be acted upon, and brought under the influences of the gospel. Men, as little as church members, sink of it, their individual efforts for Christ's cause, constitute a part of the Divine arrangements for the salvation of men. These efforts have been incorporated into the plan for raising men up from the gradation of sin, to the heights of glory above. Can a man, then, be different to this great thought, to this sublime mission which God has marked out for him? Alas! many have already ceased to work, as individuals, in the cause of God. They are not "careful to maintain good works," and the consequence is, they have sunk down into a moral slumber, from which they may never recover. Oh! how long shall it be so in the church, everywhere, that men are not up to a sense of its duty and its privileges, in working as individuals in the cause of the Saviour?

For the N. O. Christian, 19

Mr. Editor: I conceive this to be one of the greatest means of promoting a revival of religion, and not only does God require it, and the church, and religion demands it, but the world expects it. And, indeed, the minister cannot have free access to the hearts of sinners, unless his members discharge this duty. And when the church members do their duty in this respect, they are not only prepared to hear the word themselves, but the gospel will prove what it is in truth, "the power of God unto the salvation of souls." And in this way, the church will be blessed, and God's name glorified. How are we to get out of our lukewarm state? is a question of no little importance, and I would suggest a few thoughts as to the best means.— First, plain, well-timed preaching on the necessity of family religion is necessary. I have observed that our preachers do not urge the importance of family prayer, on the heads of families, as much as our fathers did in the early days of Methodism; and the neglect of this has proved fatal to vital religion among us. Secondly, let the preachers in charge of circuits, rigidly enforce the rules of the church respecting family prayer, until our members learn that we are determined to have no drones in the hive. Then, and not till then, may we expect the church to come forth from the wilderness, as "fair as the sun, as clear as the moon, and terrible as an army with banners." In the third place, let our church meetings be organized in all our churches, and the subject of prayer-meetings be taken into consideration, and insist on the members, to meet weekly in prayer meetings, to pray for the prosperity of Zion.

The church needs to be stirred up on this subject. And I think, when the membership of the church is thereby aroused, we may look for such a revival as we have never witnessed over these lands. I have held meetings in the Arbacocho circuit, and I think with good results. I think it will prove successful in the accomplishment of the object had in view by the General Conference.

Yours in the bonds of the gospel.

THOUGHTS BY THE WAY.

or the N. O. Christian Advocate.

Mr. Editor: Having explored my work—Milton—and having made partial arrangements to keep house, I returned to Pine Level, Ala., for my "better half" and Oscar. For when I left them in January it was almost impossible to travel across the prairie country. But now having returned, a new difficulty had to be met in the shape of pocket strength, as my pocket-book was minus all but four (4) dollars. And I had to address myself to this task as best I could, realizing the truth of Dr. Franklin's remark, "He that goes borrowing goes sorrowing." With great anxiety, and after some disappointments, I succeeded, by the help of friends, in raising the needed sum. Also, having made arrangements to be sent through from Troy, Ala., to Milton, Florida, we took a tearful adieu of home and loved ones, and set out to "strike a streak" of lucky bad luck: This began the first day; for, upon reaching Troy, I learned that the whole chain of preparation had been broken by knocking out an important link. Hence a new one had to be improvised, which, luckily, was soon accomplished. Next morning, though a cloudy and threatening rain, our trusty driver, with his wagon and two little mules, started with us for Greenville, Ala., and after two days of hard pulling and hard riding, over slippery bridges, bad creeks, and up and down muddy hills, jaded and sleepy, we reached G. in the night. Soon however, our baggage was stored, and we were pleasantly located in a rather poorly furnished room, at the moderate price of $2 for simply a bed. Having charged the servant on our minds to wake us at two o'clock A. M., to be ready for the down train, we were soon wrapped in "balmy sleep." In the morning, the mind proving more faithful than the servant, we awoke in due time, and by the kindness of Mr. Wilson, Railroad Agent, succeeded in getting everything on board the cars, and away we thundered. But the mind was soon arrested by a folksome company on board for New Orleans. Really I thought some of them rendered themselves ridiculous as well as conspicuous, by foolish talk and sharp-sayings. A due proportion of modesty is becoming a gentleman, and much more a lady, in public society. However, at the right time we reached Pollard, our point of destination on the railroad, expecting to get conveyance forthwith for Milton. But here comes disappointment again. The flatboat on the Conecuh river having been sunk for sometime, and a new one, as yet, not finished. Being detained a whole day in P., I devoted a portion of the time to reading the "Lost Cause;" and, although I began with 'prejudices against the work, I now believe, as far as read, that its theory of origin, development, and division of this government, not only an able vindication of the South, but a complete and unanswerable triumph.

After considerable delay and expense we reached M., believing that the appointments and the neglect of the Church in the financial department have broken the bond of connection, and located many an itinerant minister, particularly the later item. Oh! how many a minister's heart has bled and grown weak by this criminal neglect. Why, I have known a minister of distinguished ability, filling the second highest position in the gift of the Church, living—no, making out—for sometime upon bread, peas and coffee, with but little else. Nevertheless, our people expect the preacher to be punctual and faithful. Many of them never think of the embarrassment to which the preacher is thus subjected. In some cases it costs a fourth or eighth of the year's wages to get to the next charge. In my case: last year I received $268, and paid out $95 in getting to my work this year. In such cases the statement is met by saying, "These are hard times." That is true, but these hard times fall most heavily upon many of the preachers.

THE M. E. CHURCH IN YAZOO CITY, MISSISSIPPI.

When the late war closed there was a large class of colored members in communion with the M. E. Church, South, in Yazoo City, Miss., many of whom were intelligent and pious. These members had been brought to repentance through the instrumentality of Southern Methodist ministers, who had also gathered them into the fold of Christ, and had instructed them in "the things which belong unto their peace." They had for many years enjoyed the free use of our church, and the pastoral care and ministrations of our preachers; and all this while they were contented and happy.

hour after the surrender of the moderate forces the Rev Mr. McKinnin, of the M. E. Church, came to Yazoo City, in the capacity of a Presiding Elder, to look after the religious interests of the colored people. He came with his pockets well filled with Missionary money, and he opened to him the way to success, as the sequel indicates.

With a very few exceptions the colored people left their old and long-tried friends and followed the stranger. Our congregation was suddenly reduced from a crowded house to a mere handful, inasmuch we contemplated desisting our labors amongst them, and were prevented from so doing only by the remonstrance of the faithful few.

Mr. Brakeman organized his church and quarterly conferences, licensed our old class-leader to preach, and gave him the pastoral charge of the society. After this he visited them quarterly, and paid the colored preacher for his services out of the Missionary fund in his possession.

Time rolled on. The colored people became dissatisfied with their church relations, and sent for the Rev. Thos. Stringer, of the A. M. E. Church, who was at that time stationed in the city of Vicksburg. He came, and they all went over to him. He re-organized them, re-appointed their officials, and re-licensed their preacher. They went so far as to attempt to transfer the church property to the A. M. E. Church. Mr. Stringer deported himself like a Christian minister, and won the confidence and esteem of all, both white and colored, who formed his acquaintance. Having finished the object of his mission, he returned to Vicksburg.

Mr. Brukeman returned and saw what had been done. He went to work industriously to bring back his prodigal children, and with success. The following is a true copy of a letter he then wrote for them to the "disturber of their peace:"

"YAZOO CITY, Miss., July 3, 1866.

"BROTHER STRINGER—Sir," OUR Presiding Elder, brother Brakeman, has been here, and we learn that you are not of his church. And we say to you that we intend to stand upon the first foundation, and remain with him and his church who first came to us and have done so much for us; they have built us a church and given us a free gospel. And brother Brakeman does not take money from us, but gives us money to help us.

You have deceived us, and have done wrong in so doing. We do not want your license to preach, and will not use it, nor labor to build up your church, which has done nothing for us, but to ask us for money. We are obliged to you for preaching to us, but say to you, you need not come any more, nor send any one to divide us or try to separate us from the mother church. We are living in peace and getting along well enough, and do not need to be disturbed. We think a good Shephard will seek for the sheep that are lost and without a father, not for the sheep already in the fold.

"Your brothers in Christ, . . .
 "TOLBERT GIBBS,
 "RICHLARD BRISTER, and
 "MARY AUTHURS."

comment is unnecessary. Only compare the letter with the following facts, which can be substantiated. I received it from the lips of men whose signatures are affixed, to Mr. B., and not they, was the author of the letter, and a part of it I denied ever having heard before. But mark the last sentence: "I think a good Shepherd will seek for sheep that are lost and will not consider, not for the sheep already in the fold." We agree with him here, wonder why he did not think of sooner! Mr. Brakeman, on his principles, is not a good Shepherd. The difference between his rise with the colored people in New York City, and Mr. Stringer, is this: Stringer came to them pursuant to an invitation from them, and while they were dissatisfied; and Mr. Brakeman came uninvited while they were contented and happy in the M. A. Church, South.

W. B. LEWIS.
Leavenworth, Miss. March 20 1867.

We extract the following from a letter written by Rev. Dr. NEWMAN to the New York Methodist :

Political movements in our city and State are in confusion; but it is the confusion which precedes form and order. There are now in New Orleans four Union organizations—the Army of the Republic, 3000 strong; the Ben Butler Clubs, composed of citizens; the Republican Central Committee, the members of which are men of color; and the National Union Club, to which many of our lawyers and merchants belong. These may all unite, but the Army of the Republic will likely control the whole, and give form and direction to coming political events. But there is danger of a division among the blacks. There is but little sympathy between the free-born negroes and the freedmen. Many of the former are wealthy, intelligent, and aristocratic. They are opposed to the disfranchisement of rebels, and it is thought they will join the party of the South. It is to be feared that some have counted too largely on the black vote. The negroes are men, and, like the whites, may vote against each other. What Louisiana needs most, and now is a competent leader to unite the loyal elements and marshal them in solid phalanx. Durant is the man, were he here. His purity of character, eminent abilities, great wealth, and controlling influence, combine to qualify him for a leader.

THREE COMPANIES AT WORK IN NORTH ALABAMA—A BRIEF STATEMENT OF THEIR OPERATIONS AND SUCCESS.

We are indebted to a reliable gentleman, who has lately returned from the oil district near Courtland, Ala., for information in regard to the operations and probable success of the oil borers in that vicinity.

It appears that for some time past a number of companies have been engaged in the region of Courtland, boring for oil. Lands on Town creek, Big Nance and other streams, were secured last spring, and arrangements made for operating. Three companies are actively at work, and one of them, the West Tennessee Oil and Manufacturing Company, organized in Memphis, succeeded in actually striking oil about two weeks ago, at a depth of 338 feet. The well is on Crooked creek, a tributary of Big Nance, and about six miles from this place.

The news of striking oil spread rapidly, and created considerable excitement. The quantity of oil obtainable could not be ascertained except by pumping, but sufficient made its appearance on the surface of the water brought up by the sand pump to place beyond doubt the fact that petroleum exists in quantities sufficient to justify extensive operations. The quality brought to the surface is said, by experienced persons, to be greater than that at first found in many wells in Pennsylvania, which after pumping so as to exhaust the water, yielded hundreds of barrels of oil per day.

The company commenced preparations for tubing and pumping the well, but meanwhile continued boring, and on Saturday again struck oil, this time at the depth of 283 feet. Here, too, strikes indicate the existence of petroleum in considerable quantity, and parties interested in enterprises in this region are excited with the prospects. The well is now being tubed, and pumping will be commenced in a few days.

The result will be awaited with great interest as the success of this well would give a new impetus to petroleum operations in this vicinity. The Alabama and Mississippi company has a well about one and half miles from the above. They had reached a depth of over three hundred feet, when one of the boring tools broke off in the well, and has not yet been extricated. The indications were favorable. The same company is boring another well near the Tennessee river.

the microscope reveals to us the existence of a small black spot of diameter of a pin's head in the potato. In this small space can be detected some two hundred ferocious animals of a coleopterous form, which bite and tear each other with untamed fury. It is easy to comprehend the potato disease when an intestine war is raging.

MONTGOMERY CONFERENCE—
CAMDEN DISTRICT.

Mr. Editor: Here are a few items from the Camden District, pertaining to the Methodists and Baptists within its bounds. There are two Associations in the territory of this District, one called "the Bethlehem Baptist Association," and the other, "The Pine Barren Baptist Association." I have before me the minutes of these associations, and, also, the Minutes of the Montgomery Conference—from these I gather my items.

The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has in this district 1708 white members, 1229 colored members, and 27 local preachers. There are reported in the Minutes for 1865, in this District, 1704 white members, 1257 colored members, 323 white probationers, 323 colored probationers, and 21 local preachers. Here is shown a decrease of 306 white members, 28 colored members, and the entire number of probationers! I cannot comprehend this. The Quarterly Conferences held last year on nearly all the stations and circuit, received reports of accessions, while there were not more than the usual number of expulsions, withdrawals, and deaths reported. Do the preachers get their statistics from the Church Records? There is certainly a spiritual dearth in this work, and a failure in zeal and labor. The preachers and members must renew themselves in every good word and work.

The Minutes of the Baptist Associations, embraced in this district, show, 2110 white members, and 1621 colored members. They report a decrease of 205 members, white and black. In the report adopted by one of the Associations on "the state of religion," is this language: "It is with pain that your Committee notice the declension, the coldness and barrenness in religious matters, generally complained of in the church letters." In the report adopted by the other Association, they say: "We rejoice to know that peace seems to prevail throughout the churches, but we regret to find that the state of religion seems to be in a cold and languishing condition in almost every church."

The Baptists have in this district, 402 white and 352 colored members more than the Methodists. The Methodist decrease in members, the last year is greater than that of the Baptist. Why is this?

We report from this district, for Missions, $333 15 and for Conference fund $295 35. The Baptists did not do any thing for foreign Missions; but reported for Missions in their bounds $446 40; and for publishing the Minutes $126 90; and for general purposes $7.

The Methodists have in the District 11 pastors and 57 churches, and the Baptists have 22 pastors and 74 churches.

In the Pine Barren Baptist Association, they appear to be on good terms, and in christian-fellowship with their colored members, and anticipate a mutual benefit, but in the Bethlehem Association, they are somewhat divided, and a little troubled. In Pensacola and at Milton, the colored membership have taken their church-houses, and left the white members without places to worship. They, however, let them occupy the house in part, at Milton. Seeing the results, which may, and do, follow from their republican and democratic church principles, and voting privileges, some preachers and members are exceedingly anxious to get rid of their colored brethren. They contend that when the colored members are in the majority, which is often the case, they may call a colored preacher to the pastorate of the church, etc. This is certainly true, and according to Baptist theology, is right. I have been informed, that in some places within the bounds of this Association, they have expelled the colored membership en masse!

But others in this Association are quite as anxious to retain the negroes, in connection with them. The report adopted by this Association was only signed by a majority of the Committee. As this report is a curious and presumptuous document, I give it in this connection: "Your Committee to whom was referred the responsible duty of reporting on the condition of the colored people, regret that the time is too short to do justice to so important a subject. We venture, however, to recommend to the Association, the adoption of the following resolutions, viz:

"Resolved: 1st. That the Christian obligations due from the whites, to the blacks, are not changed by the revolution through which our country has passed, and that there should be no change in church relations; the black members still should remain under the government of the whites; but, as the blacks are made citizens, by the laws of Congress, and hence, all state restrictions removed to their education, it is our duty to aid these unfortunate people, all we can in their religious, moral and literary improvement.

"2nd. This, in a religious point of view, can best be effected by holding separate services with and for them, in which not only the gospel in its purity, be preached, but also a sound and wholesome scriptural discipline exercised. These services to be conducted under the supervision of a judicious committee, appointed by the church, allowing colored members to vote in matters only pertaining to themselves, in these meetings, let Conference be held, and all matters of discipline transacted, and when adopted by the Church, become a part of the statistics.

"3rd. Believing, that in the uncultivated state of the negroes, a separation would be fraught with evil to the white members, and destructive to the black membership, we recommend, that where separation has taken place, a reconciliation be effected if practicable."

"This course is indicated from the following reasons:

"1st. Should the Baptists, the only conservators of the whole truth as it is in Jesus, turn away from these people, they may 'wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction,' falling into the wildest fanaticisms, and diminish the number of witnesses for the truth, and swell the ranks of error and superstition.

"2nd. This is our duty, as God required us to do all the good we can.

"3rd. It is our interest, because the more they are elevated in point of morality, the safer will be our persons and property."

Out of the Baptist Church "the whole truth as it is in Jesus" cannot be found! They are the only "witnesses for the truth!"

All others belong to "the ranks of error and superstition!" Such arrogance! Other denominations certainly can, and ought to, do something in the education, evangelization, and elevation of the colored people in this country.

Our colored membership are doing better in this District, than the white members.

The sale and use of ardent spirits are causing more injury, and scandal to the church than anything else. The members of the church, many of them, sell and drink it to intoxication. They claim that there is nothing in the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors; and that there is nothing wrong in it.

A revival of pure religion is much needed.

Yours Truly,
ANSON WEST.

SCRIPTURAL NUMBERS.

It is a singular fact that while we expect and allow small discrepancies in all ancient works, we cannot permit the least variation in the Bible. We know that it is but reasonable to suppose that a work, especially if voluminous, transcribed and handed down through the changes and casualties of some thousand years, would be liable to occasional small discrepancies; and yet, in the Scriptures, we blend the idea of their original inspiration with a false notion that every transcriber since, must have been guarded by a miraculous power.

There is no part of the Divine Record, perhaps, that has been handled with more severity, or produced a greater subject for skeptics, than the apparent disagreement in the numbers of the returned Israelites, which exists between the accounts in Ezra and Nehemiah, as if a trifling disagreement of two scribes, respecting the numbers of a few families, could invalidate the whole body of Divine Truth.

This will show us, too, how dangerous it is for persons unskilled and almost entirely unacquainted with the Scriptures, to judge too hastily respecting those things on which such tremendous issues are involved; and yet Paine has made more unbelievers through this little circumstance, not understood, than any other in the Bible. Bishop Watson's answer that it may have occurred through the similarity of the Hebrew letters or numerals, is scarcely satisfactory; but Dr. Clarke gives a better solution of the difficulty.

While he shows that Ezra wrote a hundred years later than Nehemiah, and consequently many families may have diminished, and many others have come in from Babylon by his time; yet, says Clarke; we find that if we put Ezra's surplus to Nehemiah's sum, and the surplus of Nehemiah to the number in Ezra, the numbers will be precisely the same to a unit.

Thus: The number in Ezra 29,818
Surplus in Nehemiah 1,765

31,583

The number in Nehemiah 31,089

The surplus in Ezra 494

Sum total..... 31,583

FIRST SESSION OF THE MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor: I send you a short account of the first Mississippi Annual Conference, which met at Bro. Wm. Fosters on Pine Ridge, six miles from Natchez, the 10th of October, 1866. And as it has been fifty years last October, since it met, and only three of the members are now living, and as there have been some mistakes about the Conference, I will quote from my Journal, which I kept at the time of the Conference, which I believe to be correct, beginning two days before it met: "Tuesday, 8th of October, 1866. Early this morning, I start to Conference, from Bro. Selk's, in company with Bros. Winans, Sellers, and Whitton. At Bro. Hodges', Bros. Booth and Cotton joined our company. We conversed on a variety of subjects. Bro. Winans was our chief speaker. Wednesday 9th. We rode into Natchez—purchased a few articles, then rode to Bro. Wm. Fosters, where our Conference is to meet to-morrow. Thursday 10th. We look in vain for the Bishop. I preached at 12 o'clock, from Math. 1. 21st. Conference met at 3 P. M. Dr. Sellers in the chair, Bro. Menefee is our Secretary. Conference adjourned at 5 o'clock to meet to-morrow at 8 o'clock. Friday 11th. Conference met according to adjournment, Bro. Sellers in the chair. We proceeded to business. At ten minutes after 10 o'clock, Bro. Winans advanced slowly up the steps, (for our Conference was in a room up stairs,) and with a pleasant smile, asked pardon for interrupting us, and to our great joy, announced the arrival of Bishop Roberts. But as the Bishop was much fatigued, in consequence of his long, lonesome journey through the Indian nation, (for he came alone,) Conference adjourned until 2 o'clock. At 12 o'clock Bro. Menefee preached to a serious audience, from Heb. IV. 9. Conference met at 2 o'clock, Bishop Roberts in the chair. We now feel like we are in order for doing business. Adjourned at 5 o'clock. Saturday 12th. Conference met at 8 o'clock, Bishop Roberts in the chair, proceeded to business. Adjourned half after 11 o'clock. At 12 Bishop Roberts preached from Heb. XII, chap. first verse. His sermon carried everything before it. The big tears rolled down the Bishop's manly face, and there was scarcely a dry eye in the congregation. His word was attended by the power of the Holy Spirit. He is truly a good and great preacher. That sermon will never be forgotten. In the evening, we met and attended to some business, and adjourned until Monday, 8 o'clock.

Sunday 13th, Bro. Sellers preached at 10 o'clock, from Cor. I. 28, after which the Deacons were ordained. (Bro. Thomas Owens was one of them.) Bishop Roberts preached from Jer. IX. 23, 24. The elders were then ordained. (I was ordained Elder to-day, the first elder the Bishop had ordained, so he told me afterwards.) At night Bro. Hewitt preached from Rom. VI. 21-22. Monday 14th, Conference met at 8 o'clock, and after attending to some business, our appointments were read out, viz: Mississippi district—No. P. E., (but by the unanimous request of the Conference, Rev. Thos. Griffin, was sent from the Tennessee Conference, to preside on the district.) Natchez and Claiborne, John Menefee; Wilkinson, John Lane (Samuel Sellers); Amite, Thos. Owens; Pearl River, Peter James; Tombigby—to be supplied; Chickasaw Bay—Elijah Gentry; Louisiana district—Ashley, Hewitt, P. E., Rapide—Alexander Fleming; Attakapas—Thomas Nixon; Ouachita—Ashley Hewitt." (The Tombigbee circuit was supplied from the South Carolina Conference.) As there has been some mistake respecting the names of the members of this Conference, I will here give a correct list: Samuel Sellers, John Menefee, John Lane, Ashly, Hewitt, Peter James, Thos. Owens, Elijah Gentry, James Dixon, Thomas Nixon. Bro. Winans was there, but was local, and not allowed even a seat in the Conference room, while we were in session. Very different from the present time. As I continued with Bishop Roberts, several days after Conference, I will again quote from my Journal:

"Tuesday, 15th—Bro. Lane and I, accompanied the Bishop to Esq. Chews, where we spent the night. Wednesday, 16th—We rode into Natchez, and at night, the Bishop preached to a large audience, from Heb. II. 3., many wept, and all were serious and attentive. Thursday, 17th—The Bishop preached at Washington, to a large assembly, from Luke XVI. 31. We dined at Dr. Rollins', spent the night at Dr. Toolys. Friday, 18th—We rode to Mr. Sejourners. Saturday, 19th—Dined at Dr. Hodges, then on to Major Richardson's. (Bro. Winans' brother-in-law.) Sunday, 20th—At Midway church, Bro. Lane preached the first sermon, from I. Peter II. 4, after which Bishop Roberts preached from John I. 29. All was attention and order, the Bishop preached one of his best sermons. After preaching, an old gentleman, who thought Bro. Lane was the Bishop, said, 'the Bishop preached us a good sermon, but that old man that preached after him, (which was the Bishop,) I think beat the Bishop.' When we told the Bishop, he enjoyed the mistake finely, and said, 'see what a name can do.'

I traveled with the Bishop more than a week, and could relate several events, which I noted in my Journal, which might, probably, be interesting to some of the readers of your paper. I kept a journal from the fall of 1815 to 1818, part of which I have revised and copied off for my own use, I may send you a few scraps of this Journal hereafter. Your Bro. in Christ,

Thos. Nixon.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

Mr. Editor: Pardon me, for asking a few questions, which I presume almost any of your correspondents can easily answer.

I read, referring to the time of John the Baptist and the Saviour, that "Synagogues were the Jewish places of worship."

In what sense were they Jewish? Or, they were Jewish, in contradistinction to what? Not to Christian, because there could be no such distinction until some time after the crucifixion. I understand that it was the rejection of Jesus as Christ, by those Jews who did reject him, which alone creates the contrast between Jews and Christians. And as this rejection could not be finally made until after the death of Jesus, then in the period alluded to, how could there be Jewish places of worship which were not also Christian places of worship?

Again, we read—referring to Luke 22. I. 2. "The Jews conspired against Christ." Now, first, the text in question, certainly does not hold out the idea that the Jews, meaning any considerable number of them, much less the great body of the Jewish people, conspired against Christ; but, it does clearly incite the very opposite idea, viz: that a little handful of priests and others conspired against him, but that the Jews, the mass and body of the Jewish people, were decidedly hostile to such conspiracy.

Secondly, I am not able to find any history, which, by any fair construction, inculcates the doctrine, or necessitates the belief, that any considerable proportion, say a majority, of the Jews living at the time of the crucifixion, conspired at any time, against Christ, or opposed him or his messiahship. Much less do I find that the Jews did so. May I ask to be informed?

Proselytes are said to be "Gentiles who had been converted to the Jewish religion." And what religion is that? There is a religion well known to every body as the Jewish religion. It is even now abundantly in many parts of the world. It may be traced back, historically, to nearly the period of the crucifixion, where we find its origin. But I never heard of anybody being converted or proselyted to that faith. But, the remark quoted above, has reference to a period, anterior, to the origin of this Jewish religion. And in this period of the world, I am not able to find any religion—that is, any established, written, or distinctive faith—which, with any propriety could be called Jewish, except the simple common christianity of the Bible. And so, the proselytes I read of, were converted to the revoked religion—to christianity.

Am I right? If not, please let me be corrected.

And again The "certain men" referred to in Acts 15. 1, and said to be "Jews who had become Christians." How can it be said at that day, of Jews, against whom there is no evidence, that they had ever denied that Jesus was Christ—that they became Christians from being Jews? Whatever errors they may have imbibed about their own religion, is there any evidence that they had not been Christians or might not have been, from their boyhood, which might have been, so far as I know, as early as the Saviour's boyhood? I can understand the words Jews who had become Christians, to mean only such persons as had once been Jews in opposition to Christianity, and who renounced this opposition and became Christians.

And again. Referring to act 23. 6. it is said that "Paul agreed with the Pharisees in believing that the soul lives after the death of the body, and that there will be a resurrection; points on which they differed from the Sadducees." But this is a very different thing from what Paul said. He did not say he agreed with the Pharisees on some points, but that he was a Pharisee out and out. Did not Paul live and die a Pharisee?

And there are several other points on which I greatly desire information.

What the Men of the Northwest Ask Themselves in Their Own Minds, and What They Answer.

Question. What is the name of the skeleton in Eastern closets?

Answer. Repudiation of the national debt.

Q. Why does the prospect of Repudiation frighten them so?

A. Because they are the receivers, and the Northwest, West and South are the payers of the debt.

Q. How did Eastern men manage to have it so arranged?

A. By bringing on the late war.

Q. Why did they bring on the late war?

A. Well they saw that negro slavery was profitable to the South, and they conceived the grand idea of reducing all the people of the United States, white and black, to a state of slavery to themselves.

Q. What is slavery?

A. Slavery is that state of society in which the surplus earnings of the slave are applied to the sole use and benefit of the master.

Q. What is the amount of the surplus earnings of the people of the Northwest, West and South annually?

A. They amounted last year to the sum of about $575,000,000.

Q. What became of those surplus earnings?

A. After deducting a small amount to support the Government, the balance went into the pockets of foreign and Eastern bond-holders.

Q. What proportion of the debt of the United States is held by foreigners?

A. About one-fifth.

Q. Who owns the balance?

A. Eastern men.

Q. How did they come to own it?

A. During the war they did the contracting, while the West and Northwest did the fighting. The East furnished the shoddy, the bad pork and beef, the wormy bread, the guns that burst, the old rotten transports, in which so many soldiers were drowned, the fire-proof whisky, the Yankee notions, the negro substitutes, the hollow talk about loyalty, "the life of the nation," and all that; they gathered home all the silver spoons and other portable property, and so became rich, while the West and Northwest furnished the food for powder, and are gathering their dead from a thousand battlefields, and with the South, are now called upon to pay the national debt.

Q. What is a summary of the result of the war?

A. Why, the negroes are to be paid for at a very high valuation; but instead of their owner getting paid, the price goes into the pockets of the shrewd Eastern Yankee, and comes out of the surplus earnings of all the other sections.

Q. Why are the surplus earnings of the people of the Northwest, West and South so small?

A. Because of the enormous amount of indirect taxation they are compelled to pay to Eastern manufacturers.

Q. Explain?

A. Eastern men have so arranged the legislation in Congress that the tariff on foreign manufactures is so high as to exclude them from the country; so that Eastern men charge what profit they choose on their own manufactures; all of which profit comes out of the consumers, goes into the pockets of the Eastern manufacturer and so lessens the surplus earnings of the other sections.

Q. Now that the negroes are free, why do the Yankee fuglemen, Butler, Sumner, Stevens, etc., keep up such a howl about them?

A. By this they expect to keep the people of various sections of the country by the ears, and thus prevent them thinking about repudiation.

Q. Will they succeed in doing so?

A. No.

Q. Why?

A. Because the people are beginning to think.

Q. Why do the people begin to think so very hard?

A. Why, they know and feel that everything they use costs about three times as much as it used to, and they are thinking where all the money goes and what becomes of it.

Q. What is to come of all this hard thinking?

A. The people are going to act.

Q. How?

A. Why, somebody out West will run for Congress on the repudiation ticket, and, if elected, then several others will run for Congress on the same ticket, and be elected; then somebody will run for President on the same ticket, and be elected; then they will reconstruct the Supreme Court on the same ticket, and then comes repudiation.

Q. What! repudiate a debt to which the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged?

A. Yes; it was a Yankee trick getting the pledge, and it is Yankee chicanery that keeps up the talk about the pledge.

Q. To what other institutions was the solemn faith of the United States pledged?

A. To the great United States Bank and to the institution of negro slavery.

Q. What became of those institutions?

A. The first was repudiated by Gen. Jackson, and the other by Mr. Lincoln.

Q. Who is the coming man for whom the people of the Northern States anxiously look?

A. The man who will make a dollar be a dollar; who will bring free trade and cheap goods; who will abolish the Internal Revenue and paper money; who will utterly squelch the hordes of tax gatherers who now consume the substance of the people; in fine, the man who will bring about repudiation of the national debt.—Dagton Empire.

BISHOP WIGHTMAN.—The Greenville, Ala., Advocate, exhorts Alabama Methodists to purchase an Episcopal residence for Bishop McTear at Montgomery, and bring him back from Nashville—partly on the ground that Bishop Wightman has determined to make South Carolina his home. The Charleston, S. C. News commenting on this statement says: "Bishop Wightman will take up his residence in this, his native city, and is expected with his family about the first of next month."

FUNERAL OF BISHOP SOULE.

Rev. Enoch Mudge, one of the successors of Lee, says of him: Joshua had a precocious mind, a strong memory, a manly and dignified turn, although his appearance was exceedingly rustic. In June, 1797, he was made a partaker of precious faith, and had peace with God.

In 1798, when only seventeen years old, he was encouraged to travel with the Presiding Elder, and accompanied him round the district. In this tour he not only helped in the public services of religion; but his exhortations were earnest and lively, attracting general attention, and giving promise of a future of great usefulness, and commanding influence. At the ensuing Conference, held in the city of New York, on the 19th of June, 1799, he was admitted into the traveling connection, and appointed to the Portland Circuit, in Maine. In 1800 he traveled the Union River Circuit, which lay in the district of Maine, near the British line. In 1801-'2, and '3, he labored in Massachusetts, filling respectively the appointments of Sandwich, Needham, and Nantucket. He was returned in 1804, as Presiding Elder of the district, which embraced the whole territory of the present State of Maine. He filled this office two years; and so successful was the Church during this period, that in 1806 a new district was formed called Kennebec. On this district Mr. Soule was employed in 1806 and '7. The succeeding four years were spent on the Portland District, in the same State. In 1812, he was stationed in Lynn, Massachusetts; but the following year he was reappointed to the Kennebec District, and continued to travel it until the General Conference of 1816.

He was elected to Deacon's orders in 1800, at the close of the year, when Conference was held in Boston. His circuit that year was the farthest one east. He started by ship—a storm arose—with bare poles they were driven far out, and did not reach the seat of Conference till it had closed. Next year (1801) he was ordained deacon by Bishop Wheaton, and one year after, elder by the same apostolic man. In 1816 he was elected, with Thomas Mason as assistant, to conduct the Book Concern in New York. His general force of character, expanding itself to fill every position, must have induced this call, for he had no mercantile education, was no regular accountant, and had no wish for the place. He boxed all the books himself—had few or no losses by transmissions or letters—did his own packing. The hymn-book and Discipline were the principle publications. He was his own book-editor; edited the Magazine also from 1818; went home at 9 p. m. and worked on the Magazine till 12 or 1 o'clock. Hence it was pleasantly called "the work of darkness."

The wear and tear, the drudgery and worry, the anxiety and responsibility of those four years in the Book Concern, he would not endure again, or go over, for all of 200 Mulberry street. He frankly told the General Conference upon his unsolicited election, that he knew nothing of the business. If they laid the duty on him, he would undertake it and do it to the best of his ability; but he considered they ran a very great risk indeed. But he succeeded.

In 1816 he took part in organizing the American Bible Society, for circulating the word of God without note or comment. And it was ever a satisfaction to him to reflect that his hand had been on the cornerstone of that great and Christian institution.

"I never told you of my conflict with infidelity."

"What, bishop—before you were converted?"

"No; afterward. After I became a preacher, sir. It was my third year in the ministry. I was stationed or appointed to Needham Circuit, near Boston. About Boston, then, infidelity was very bold and organized. On my circuit they came to church and raised questions with the Methodist preachers, even in the pulpit, disputing and gaining. No uncommon thing for the preacher to be contradicted in the pulpit.

To prepare myself, I read infidel books, and took rather a strong dislike. Read Paine's Age of Reason—much in vogue then—but easily disposed of that; that was not much. Read Voltaire, Bolingbroke, Gibbon, and others—resolved to know their ground.

"My mind got deeply involved in difficulties. Every spare moment I was at work, often burning midnight oil. I took to my and the doubts and the answers the best. My Bible was near me. I longed for a conversion, beyond doubt, that my Bible was true; for a heavenly conviction. One night, about midnight, alone in my room, these books spread out and my Bible in the center, as I prayed and pondered, an impression—strong, clear, comforting as, the Spirit—was made directly on my soul—my Bible is of God—is true. Then, for the first and last time, I shouted aloud, with both hands on the opened book, 'My Bible is true! my Bible is true!' [Tears were in his eyes, as he told this.]

The occasion of his telling me was, I held in my hand the first volume of the old Methodist Magazine. Opening at the introduction or salutation, he confessed to the authorship of it. One word, sentimentally, in that salutatory, pointed to him, as well as the general style. It seemed to be his own word, and well did it fit his lips as often it fell from them. I remarked that the first article was on the Evidences of the Christian Religion, and extracted from the Edinburgh Encyclopedia. He replied:

"Yes, and there is nothing better on that subject. Paley helped me much, but the Edinburgh Encyclopedia was of vast benefit to me. I had tried it, and, therefore, the leading article in the Magazine was taken from it, and continued through many numbers. I knew its value, sir, from experience."

"The Sunday after the triumph in my own mind, and my Bible was given to me as a true book, I had an appointment to preach in a nest of these infidels. I knew they would be on hand. Sure enough, my eye rested at once upon the chief one—P.—in the congregation. My text was—'Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept.' If ever I had help from the Spirit in preaching, I had help that day. I eyed my man, but neither he nor any one else offered me a conflict that day. To my astonishment, he came up and asked me home with him. I saw he was broken up. To make the story short, I went home with him. He was converted. I baptized his household before leaving. And when I left, as my way lay toward Boston, he requested me to procure a neat family Bible—for though he once had one, he had burnt it. He and his whole family I left in the Church; good and staunch members they were. That was a triumph of gospel truth, sir."

It is noteworthy, and, though anticipating the regular order of the sketch, may be stated here, how powerfully this man and his contemporaries preached the resurrection. It was a stock theme of Peter and the other apostles, and with great power such preaching was accompanied. The resurrection is not a mere speculation, a subject for entertaining disquisition; but it carries conviction to the heart of sinners, breaks down infidelity, silences gainsayers, and removes the last doubt of doubting men. It is a live argument, and one that has great and evident corollaries.

When afterward Joshua Soule, as a bishop of the Church, made his first tour of Southern Conferences, a writer known to fame thus describes him:

"Wherever he traveled he made the profoundest impression, stamped the great outlines of his heroic nature indelibly, and planted the cross so firmly that living souls clung to it with the tenacity of a faith that never relinquishes its grasp. He visited Tuscaloosa when that city was the seat of government for Alabama. It so happened that the Conference was held while the Legislature was in session; and on the Sabbath a vast concourse of the most cultivated people, including members of the Legislature, assembled to hear Bishop Soule preach. His text was: 'Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?' Acts xxvi. 8. The discourse was of the very highest order, and the effect upon the vast audience was such that it will never be forgotten. When the Bishop, advancing in the great argument, portrayed the assembled multitude which no man can number, raised from the dead and standing before God, a large proportion of the congregation rose to their feet, and stood fixed in wonder and awe as they beheld the sublime picture."

He was in every General Conference since 1808. In that of 1804 he was entitled to a seat, but failed to be present because, stationed in Nantucket, he had to travel by water, and was driven back by head-winds.

Up to 1808, the General Conference was composed of all the traveling elders. Thus this highest tribunal of Methodism had grown up. It had served its purpose well, but amendment and new adaptation was needed. Every General Conference was like a convention—the whole system of doctrine and discipline was quadratically open to its revision. There were no checks nor limitations; in fact, no constitution defining and guiding the legislative, judicial, or executive powers of the Church. Bishop Asbury wished that he might not die before Methodism was bounded and established in her forms and foundations. Besides the dangers arising from uncontrolled legislatures and mere majorities, the General Conference must be unwidely if all took their seats who were entitled to sit. The expense and difficulty of travel made it next to impossible that every traveling elder could attend from every part of the Connection. Then a greater evil ensued: the Annual Conferences bear which the General Conference met would have more than their proportion of members and influence in its deliberations. It had become evident that there must be a delegated General Conference, working under a constitution.

At the session of 1808, the present delegated body was settled upon, with its powers and constitution. Seven Annual Conferences then made up American Methodism. A committee of two from each was appointed to draw up a plan. This committee of fourteen then met, and detailed three of their number as a sub-committee, viz. Ezekiel Cooper, of the New York Conference; Philip Bruce, of the Virginia Conference; and Joshua Soule, of the New England Conference. This sub-committee agreed that each should make out a draught, and separated. When they met, Cooper and Soule had theirs; but Bruce had not. He sent to paper. This made him an umpire between the other two.

Ezekiel Cooper was a very able man, the senior of Mr. Soule. At an early day he had been at the head of the publishing interests of the Church, for "Concern" it could hardly be called. The words, as they now stand in the Discipline, were in Mr. Soule's paper—providing for a general itinerant superintendency. Cooper's ran thus: "The General Conference shall not do away with Episcopacy, nor reduce our ministry to a Presbyterial parity." The issue was made there. Finally, Bruce voted with Soule, and his plan was submitted to the committee of fourteen, and adopted without change, and by it submitted to the Conference. The constitution, for so we may call it, was debated, and laid on the table for three days. Cooper and others labored hard to have seven bishops—one for each Annual Conference. That his policy might not have been a good one, and successful, is still an open question. But there was a squinting at a third order in the ministry in his doctrine. Had the primitive and scriptural Episcopacy of Methodism been so multiplied in its members as to give to each a narrower and closer supervision, it might have been to the interest of the Church. The territorial extent of a bishop's labors has no necessary connection with the theory of ministerial parity. The Episcopal care of one Annual Conference or of seven has nothing to do with High Church pretensions, prelatic assumptions, or the figment of the succession. By cultivating the field more closely, it might be better cultivated, and its fruits conserved.

One obvious advantage of Mr. Soule's theory will be accepted as an offset to many disadvantages: It promotes connectionalism. It ties and bands the churches and Conferences together. He succeeded in getting adopted the practice and rule which still holds in the Church—of being scarce of bishops, making but few and giving them a wide and equal interest in all the Conferences, and all the Conferences an equal interest in them. It was a breadth of mission which suited well his own elevated nature and ample powers, when, in time, he was called to it. The field was not too large for such a laborer, who could be seen all over it, and felt all over it. From the northern lakes to the Gulf from the eastern cities to the Indian settlements and pioneers of the West, his diocese extended.

Jesse Leo was strenuously opposed to one feature of the plan; he did not like the election of delegates; wished them indicated by seniority, to prevent all electioneering. Lee's hobby was, Annual Conference rights. The author of the plan knew this, and met it by proposing to amend the part providing for the appointment of delegates by leaving it to the Annual Conferences to appoint by seniority or by ballot. The Virginia could no longer oppose, and thus the object was maintained while the objection was removed. Who ever heard of an Annual Conference appointing its delegates by seniority? Jesse Lee moved the adoption of the article on the general superintendency; hence the error in his life and Times, which attributes the article to him as its author. The Plan was voted on separately, and then as a whole, and adopted by a large majority.

It is a fact giving us a gauge and a key to the man that he was one of that carefully selected committee of fourteen, associated with the chief men, the princes of Israel; that he was one of the sub-committee of three, to which its business was turned over for shape and suggestion; and that he was the author of that organic chapter in our Discipline, Of the General Conference, at the age of twenty-seven.

There was a vexed question in our executive system. The plan of electing Presiding Elders by the Annual Conferences, and making them a council to fix the appointments—the Bishop being little more than moderator of the council—was favored by many and prominent men in the ministry and laity. So perfectly, and satisfactorily, and universally has this matter been settled in Methodism for forty years, that the excitement of 1812 and 1816—can hardly be realized.

Mr. Soule's theory was that the Presiding Elders were, in their executive character, the officers and vicegerents of the Bishop; and the Bishop must have the untrammelled selection of his staff. As preachers, our itinerant system could no more allow the Annual Conference to give the Presiding Elders their appointed fields of labor, than to the itinerant preachers theirs. Under such administration he held that the Episcopacy and the itinerancy would both break down. Good and great men were on the other side: Ezekiel Cooper, John Wilson, Hedding, and Waugh, (afterward Bishops), and others. Bishop Roberts was understood to favor their views. In 1816 Mr. Soule took a prominent part in the discussion. The friends of this species measure happily did not succeed.

In the General Conference of 1820, before the old question was sprung, the election for an additional Bishop was held. Though knowing his antecedents, a large majority cast their votes for Joshua Soule. Before his consecration, the Presiding Elder subject came up. He was placed in a delicate relation he could say nothing in debate. The friends of the measure carried it by a decided vote—only twenty-five voting against it, he one of them. With his views of the Episcopal office and responsibility, to accept, under such circumstances, was the least of his thoughts. "Nothing on earth could have induced him to do so." He sent in his resignation or declination to the General Conference, with his reasons. Bishop McKendree made his solemn protest against the action of the General Conference, as unconstitutional and subversive of the General Superintendency. There was a stand, and a pause. The Conference resolved to suspend the operation of the new rule for four years. In view of this, many pressing requests were made of Mr. Soule to withdraw his refusal to be consecrated. "No, never, while such a measure trammels or hangs over the Episcopacy."

In 1824 the thing had died out, and he was re-elected, and ordained by Bishop McKendree on 27th May, to the Episcopal office, at same time with Elijah Hedding. No doubt his unyielding advocacy of our Executive system of 1820, and his firm stand then made, saved it; and in saving it, clearly and without compromise, the working energy and evangelism of the whole Church were maintained. His old and beloved colleague, Bishop Hedding, afterward told him that he looked on his decisive action, especially in 1820, in this light.

By the very nature, the look and carriage of the man, he was one to make a stand. He could take a position with the highest moral effect. There was something sublime in his style of planning himself on a great principle. His courage was calm and great, his perceptions clear, his convictions firm, his survey of the situation thorough. He was not impatient. He had faith in truth and right, that in due time they would be vindicated. He could afford to bide his time. Wisdom is justified of her children. Poised on his own center, self-possessed—let others waver; he marked out his course and kept it. He took his ground and held it. Things came round, after a while; and what if they never came round—he was satisfied to be right.

Professional Students and Mechanics in the South.

Are we—under the new order of things, as we were under the old—to be overstocked in Virginia with "professional" men? There is some ground to apprehend that we shall. We have seen it stated that an undue proportion of the students in some of our leading colleges are taking the law and medical tickets. We do not set ourselves up as advisers and directors, and would not arrogantly interfere with the rights or with the private affairs of our fellow-citizens, but we feel it to be our duty as journalists and patriots to combat any practice, any principle, or any idea that may prove prejudicial to the interests of the Commonwealth. We have now more lawyers, doctors, and other non-producers than are needed; there are enough to last for twenty or thirty years. Our great wants are producers and men of practical science, to aid in developing the resources of the State, and to turn them to account when developed. Agriculture, the mechanic arts, and manufactures—the honest, manly industries—are the great sources of wealth. We want to see our young men turn their attention and devote their talents to them, and to let law and physic alone. The competition in these professions is now so great, and will be for the next quarter of a century, that few comparatively can attain the distinction and prosperity which so many covet; most of them will be but poor and proud gentlemen as long as they live. Take an intelligent, industrious young man; put him in an iron manufactory, for instance, and let him learn the business thoroughly; then start him in life with a licensed lawyer or medical graduate; and ten to one he will, in fifteen years, be rich or in a fair way to make a fortune, when the lawyer and the doctor will be without any considerable practice, or at best with only income enough to supply their commonest wants. The same result will be attained, if instead of the iron business, any of the great branches of practical industry are selected. The fortunes are not made by the professional men; the great influence that propels the business of life, and controls society and the destinies of communities and countries, does not emanate from them. The influence of the commercial, mechanical, and agricultural classes is every year growing more potent. Formerly they were, as compared with professional men, ignorant and uncultivated; but at this epoch they are the men of expansive views, and the projectors of those great enterprises that build up cities, and confer wealth, power, and grandeur upon nations. The men of ideas, of real intellect, and of supreme influence belong, in this age, to those classes. They are the men who wield the mighty influences of steam, the telegraph, and all those other practical agencies that control the affairs of life—the destinies of men and nations. If called upon to define this power, we would describe it as "educated labor." It is that which has built up the wealth and prosperity of England, and that has placed the Northern States so far in advance of the States of the South. Labor was not honored here, under the old order of things, as it deserves to be honored. Almost every young man of any pretensions studied law or medicine; or, being a landed proprietor, turned his attention to farming; or, if the son of a merchant, to merchandise. Only those who had no choice between pursuits became mechanics and artisans. There were really not enough of them for the necessities of the country; and of the comparatively small number a large proportion were ignorant and unskilled; many came from the North—some from abroad. There was in those days an indisposition among the educated young men of the South to engage in business of any sort that was not connected with the learned professions. The mistaken notion prevailed that labor was degrading—a delusion that, more than all other things combined, retarded the growth and development of Virginia. We fear that our young men are not yet emancipated from the fatal influence of this delusion, and that too many of the present generation will follow in the footsteps of those of the past generation only to reap a harvest of disappointment—for the paternal wealth that supported so many in respectable idleness no longer exists.

We rejoice to see so many schools and colleges, and to know that such large numbers of our young men and boys—much larger than we had ventured to hope for—are attending them. One chief object of education is to instill correct ideas into the minds of youth and to eradicate false ideas and opinions. We hope that our professors and teachers will not forget to combat that pernicious and too prevalent error that labor is not honorable, and that the mechanical occupations of life are unworthy of educated young men. We have known many instances of boys who manifested remarkable mechanical genius, and who, if put into the workshop, would have made their mark in the world, but who, under the fatal influence of that delusion, have been made ciphers and nonentities for life, in consequence of the attempt, against their natural bent, to make lawyers or doctors of them. Every parent should give his children as thorough an education as he can afford. The more thoroughly they are educated the better they are fitted for all the pursuits and business of life, no matter what those pursuits or that business may be. The educated mechanic or artisan dignifies labor, and removes the reproach of ignorance which so long existed. Education should embrace the whole range of physical science, for in the new era that will soon dawn upon Virginia (we speak of our own State especially,) her hitherto undeveloped resources—minerals, and water-power—will be brought into requisition. Our young men should be prepared to take the lead in this great work and profit by its rewards. The time is not distant when Virginia will be filled with workshops and manufactories of every kind; and if our own people are not qualified to take charge of them, strangers will come in and reap the harvest of fame and profit which they will surely yield.—Richmond (Va.) Whig.

FARM AND GARDEN.

ON THE APPLICATION OF GUANO.

The following suggestions from the Maryland Farmer on the proper application of guano are timely. Guano has been very extensively used in Maryland for the renovation of soils exhausted in the tobacco culture. The writer some years ago visited farms in that State, the proprietors of which assured him that they applied from forty to sixty dollars' worth of guano and chemical manures to every acre of their soil in cultivation, besides large amounts of animal manures; but the Peruvian guano was their principal reliance. The results were wonderful, but we will not strain the credulity of the reader by attempting to narrate what was told us, and the truth of which we have every reason to believe. But we doubt whether pure Peruvian guano, unless handled with intelligence and skill, is well adapted to the sandy and arid soils of Middle Georgia.

1. As we have already stated, guano is best applied in damp or showery weather.

2. When applied to land just plowed it should be immediately mixed with the soil by harrowing, or, as Mr. Mosely states, by brushing it with birches or other bushes.

3. When grain is sowed early in the Autumn, only a portion of the guano intended to be applied should be then used, but the balance should be put on in the Spring. If the whole is applied in the Fall the grain sometimes becomes too luxuriant and is liable to be injured by the frosts.

4. Guano should be applied with reference to the present crop, only, and not with the purpose of benefiting succeeding crops.

5. Guano, before application, should be mixed with five or six times its weight of charcoal, fine soil, or dried muck. We once caused four tons of Peruvian guano to spread upon a floor and mixed with six times its weight of fine black muck in layers of the two articles. After it had remained in this condition two weeks, it was overhauled and the pile evenly covered with clean muck. The same operation was repeated in two weeks more. At planting time, after the second overhauling, it was shoveled into carts, taken into the field, and a moderate handful thrown into each hill.

DRAINING WITH WOOD.—We transfer the following to our columns from the Cultivator. It is written by a Virginia gentleman, and gives considerable information on the subject of under-draining with wood. The little farm I own is now being worked by an old gentleman and his sons, who owned the place when he was "a young man, just grown up and married." When he was 30 years old he did, like many of our generous Southerners, "went security for a friend who wanted to raise some money," and was ruined thereby, being compelled to sell his farm, servants, and everything he owned, to pay out of debt. Since then he has been around from one place to another, and got along "tolerable well," until the war broke him up, and he now returns again in his old age to work the farm which was the home of his boyhood, and where rests the remains of his ancestors and relatives. In conversing with him, some weeks ago, in reference to some cross-ditches which I had dug in the meadow in 1863, I spoke of having dug up in several places, pine logs which I thought had been put there for the purpose of draining, and that I had found them in a perfect state of preservation. He replied, "Mr. M., I put them down myself more than forty years ago, when I lived here and owned the place; they worked well while I was here, but they failed to draw for some cause after I left." When I called his attention to the fact that I had found around the logs a substance resembling bark, and that I supposed that the bark from the inner side of the logs had fallen in the drain and choked it up, he said "that he had no doubt but the supposition was fully correct; that the saplings had been put down in the ditches with the bark on, he not thinking then that it would make such a difference, as he was now satisfied it had occasioned." His recollection is clear upon a very natural point, and that is that the saplings were put down perfectly green, without being seasoned any winter.

In an adjoining meadow, formerly owned by Mr. H. A. Winfield, (now sixty-six years of age), there were some old wood-n-drainings in 1859, which he put down over thirty-eight years before. They were in a perfect state of preservation, except where air had come in contact with them through holes made by mask-rats.

All of the foregoing drains were made with old field pine saplings, and were in a green state.

TO ADVERTISERS.

This paper has for many years been well known in this community as the very best advertising medium by which the business men of the city could bring their merchandise, trades, professions, and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood when it is remembered that the four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States in the Rio Grand, East Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all, more or less active agents for the paper; and when it is also remembered that our paper circulates among a large class of people who seldom see any other New Orleans paper.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order. We have reason to believe that of all the monies forwarded to us by mail but a very small amount has failed to reach us: whenever the letters have been registered.

A DISTRICT MEETING of all the ministers and official members of the New Orleans District will be held on the fourth Saturday and Sunday in April in the Carondelet street Church in this city. We hope that all of our brethren from each appointment, or as many as possible, will be present. There will be at the same time a Monthly meeting of the Stewards. All in attendance will be entertained, as usual at our Conferences.

"A SEA OF TROUBLES."

We cannot dismiss from our mind the belief that the Dominant Party of the North intend to prostrate the entire South beneath their feet, that is beneath the Negro. To put it under the control of a class of human beings who can be controlled. Who are indebted much, and will be further, to the Republican Party policy, for freedom, and present position. This phalanx of African voters will be drilled and dragooned into a discipline as available for holding the country as is the Corps D'Afrique. It is not unlikely that an "inalienable homestead," will effect that which fails to be secured by other means. All the ordinary means for dividing between the white and the colored races will be resorted to, and all the extraordinary. To stir up animosity, as bitter and as incurable as death, between the freedman and his former master, has been and will be the continued aim of the men who are determined to keep in power. So far the efforts to incite the negro to servile insurrection, open war, or midnight and indiscriminate murder, have failed. Thanks to that abundant and faithful religious teaching which our church and other churches in the South for long years persistently urged upon master and servant. But how far evil counsels may at last prevail, and awaken evil passions in the mind of the colored man is the question. He is easily raised to an undue estimate of himself when placed in a position of power, or responsibility. The old adage of "a beggar on horseback" will in his case prove true, at least, in regard to the horse. We know that, after a great deal of teaching, the population of Jamaica has steadily relapsed. Each year the race has become more thriftless and ungovernable. The smaller proportion of whites living there may modify the calculation. But, on the other hand there is to be reckoned as an offset, the constant presence and teaching here of white men who are interested in forcing the passions of the negro to a rapid development; men who have prophesied, argued, or it may be preached evil until they are pledged to its accomplishment.

The number of votes White and Black in the Southern States, according to the census of 1860, may be set down as follows, leaving out West Virginia:

States	Whites	Blacks
Virginia	794,743	119,212
N. Carolina	531,100	94,065
S. Carolina	291,388	43,703
Georgia	591,668	88,740
Florida	77,768	11,662
Alabama	526,431	78,965
Mississippi	358,901	58,085
Arkansas	324,191	48,429
Louisiana	357,029	53,645
Texas	421,294	63,194

We suppose that there will be an equal falling off in both classes from the effects of the war.

It will be seen, then, by the above that in six of the Southern States there are more black voters than white. So far as it can, the Military Bill has Africanized these States. We cannot conceive of any higher degree of vengeance than that which finds satisfaction in the utter ruin of the finest and most fertile regions of the Western World. The "tender mercies of the wicked are cruel," but save us from those of this singularly christian people. The only possible way to remedy this great calamity is for our people to act before the Republicans can thoroughly drill their allies. What we fail to do now, we shall not do at all. Let every man who can, register and qualify himself to vote. Let him direct, as far as possible, those freedmen who are the true friends of the South, in resisting a policy which ultimately must ruin this whole country.

But there are other evils and other "floods" at hand, besides those of "ungodly men." The River, more violent even than those turbid waves, is pouring on relentlessly, seeking new channels, and threatening a terrible reconstruction of the entire Delta. The Grand Levee has crevassed, and opened a highway to the River, over the whole of its right bank, from Morganza to the Gulf. This levee was completed at a cost of half a million. Upon its strength was suspended the livelihood of thousands of people. But this vent does not sensibly relieve the pressure upon other levees. Everywhere the River is rising, rising, and far above, its tributaries are swelling from the snow-meltings of the mountains. The levee system of former years will prove quite inadequate now. A thousand "hands" then came at the blast of a horn, to resist the encroachments of the water. The prospect at present is that the swamp lands of Louisiana will be given up to the squatter and wood-cutter.

Our people have under all these calamities the calmness of a great trouble. The consciousness of having done all that human foresight, human courage, and human energy could do to meet and avert the evil, sustains them. We have seen the first great flood of a Government of the People rushing madly in one direction. Our children may live to see it with equal destructiveness pour itself in another. And this very hour that region which alone has not suffered by the war is bidding for the white vote of the South. The 2500 millions, which in the form of slaves ministered more or less to the support of the whole country, has disappeared to reappear, by the alchemy of war, in New England, in the shape of untaxable U. S. Bonds; for the support of which the strength of the whole country is drained. The South is no longer worth attacking, but this great monster of self-government already looks around for some new victim. Hence the bid. But woe betide those who, from either necessity or blindness, shall unite their fortunes with men who have shown themselves devoid of those great qualities which constitute a truly great spirit. God is "King of the floods," we wait in hope.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE BISHOPS' COUNCIL; WITH REMINISCENCES OF AN ANNUAL CONFERENCE, by an Ex-Presiding Elder. St. Louis: P. M. Pinkard: 1867: 12 mo. Price $1.50.

The writer of this volume has evidently seen all the mysteries of "Cabinet" work. He knows the quality of men that compose an annual Conference. The various cases that come up at its sessions, and the usual treatment thereof are here graphically and minutely portrayed. We should not be surprised if Mississippians could recognize the characters that appear in its pages. Many a choice scrap of biographical and local church history is doubtless here preserved which will lighten and enliven the labors of the future historian of Methodism in the Southwest. Every Methodist library should hold a copy of this entertaining book. We are glad to see that our Southern people are turning their attention to departments of intellectual labor as yet scarcely attempted by them.

THE DIAMOND DICKENS.—We have received the Pickwick Papers of this edition from Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, Boston. The chief merits of this edition are its cheapness, ($1.50) distinctness of type, and tinted paper. The illustrations are original. The complete work will be issued in thirteen volumes at the rate of one per month. The admirers of Mr. Dickens will welcome this portable form of his works.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.—Republication of L. Scott: 38 Walker street, New York. February number.

Contents: The Army, Ayrshire Curling Song, The Gay Science, Colonel Gordon's Chinese Force, Eavesdropping at Biarritz, The Turret-Ships of England and America, The Working Classes, Democracy in America, True Regimen for Irish Ills, Brownlows, Note.

THE CHILDREN'S HOME.—T. S. Arthur & Son: 809 Chesnut street, Philadelphia. $1.25.

The April number of this interesting little magazine is on the table looking more than commonly attractive. Beautiful in type, thought, engravings and paper.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Rev. J. N. Dupree, writes from Dadeville, Alabama.

The Northern church has obtained a little hold in places through Tallapoosa county. But, as yet is confined to the most obscure corners, and is among those who were disaffected during the war. I do not think it will suit the people generally, there is too much of the negro equality in it. Some ministers who thought they were not properly appreciated in our church, have gone. For you know there are some who over-rate their own talents, and are the best judges themselves of their suitability to fill certain positions in the church; of this class, we have lost some in this country. There may be other influences which have carried off some. The Southern people are very much impoverished, the church poor, and the preachers fare badly sometimes. The Northern Church is rich in means, and the temptation of a large salary, has perhaps had its influence, and cause them to leave the old ship.

A letter from Rev. T. P. Roberts, Jonesboro, Ala., containing a number of subscribers, says:

"I have been here, this makes the third year, my people are kind and clever to their preacher, they care for his body as well as his soul, as far as they can, with the limited means at their command, they were once wealthy, but the freeing of the negroes, and severe droughts the past two years, have greatly reduced them; but still they resolve to do something for God and his cause. This circuit has been greatly wanting in some respects, judging from their houses of worship; scarcely a house fit to preach in, in a dry day, to say nothing of cold and rainy days. But, with all the losses, sustained in the past, we have appointed a committee to superintend the building of a good frame church, at Pleasant Hill, five miles from Jonesboro, which we hope to dedicate by the last of August. We look upon this as but the beginning."

THE RIVER.

A TERRIBLE CALAMITY.—The following telegram to the Governor from a highly respected citizen of Pointe Coupee parish, brief as it is, tells a fearful tale of destruction and ruin, privation and suffering:

Pointe Coupee, via Bayou Sara, March 27.
To His Excellency J. M. Wells, Governor:
Big crevasse at Grand Levee. No chance to close it.
F. L. CLAIBORNE.

This levee, an immense work, costing thousands upon thousands of dollars, has but recently been completed, and it was considered by the State Engineer capable of resisting any pressure from the mighty stream. It is situated on the right bank of the river, in the parish of Pointe-Coupee, and the escaping flood will inundate an exceedingly rich agricultural section of the State, making the third or fourth year (consecutively) that it has been overflowed. Great must be the loss, suffering and privation that this crevasse will cause. The subject is heartrending to contemplate.

The whole of the country on the left bank of Lafourche is overflowed. The waters from the Lafourche crevasse and from the Roman River crevasse have met.

At a point one-quarter of a mile above Carrollton the levee is in a critical condition.

The levee just above Camp Parapet—half mile above Carrollton—will require immediate attention.

The Saucere crevasse (twelve miles above Carrollton) is in very bad condition, 800 feet of it requiring immediate attention.

Unless immediate measures are taken toward securing the above levees, a large portion, or perhaps the whole of New Orleans is liable to be submerged. Very respectfully,
J. A. PORTER, Chief Engineer,
Second Division Levees.

GENERAL ORDER NO. 5.

The following important order, from Headquarters, Fifth Military District, was received at the Times office yesterday afternoon. As it would but have added to the excited state of feeling already prevailing, we refrained from issuing it in an extra edition:

OFFICIAL.

HEADQUARTERS, FIFTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
New Orleans, La., March 27, 1867.
General Orders, No. 5.

Andrew S. Herron, Attorney General, State of Louisiana, John T. Monroe, Mayor city of New Orleans, and Edmund Abell, Judge First District Court, city of New Orleans, are hereby removed from their respective offices from 12 m. to-day, and the following appointments made, to take effect from the same date viz: B. L. Lynch to be Attorney General State of Louisiana, Edward Heath to be Mayor of the city of New Orleans, and W. W. Howe to be Judge of the First District Court, city of New Orleans.

Each person removed will turn over all books, papers, records, etc., pertaining to his office, to the one appointed thereto, and the authority of the latter will be duly respected and enforced.

By command of Mayor General P. H. SHERIDAN.
Geo. L. HARTSUFF, A. A. G.

No Elections in Louisiana.

The following order was issued by Gen. Sheridan yesterday. It is more especially designed to suspend certain municipal elections in Baton Rouge and one or two other places throughout the State:

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
New Orleans, La., March 28, 1867.
Special Orders No. 7.

[Extract.]
2. It is hereby announced for the information and guidance of all concerned, that no elections for State, parish, municipal or judicial offices, will be held in the State of Louisiana, until the provisions of the law of Congress entitled "An Act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and of the act supplementary thereto, shall have been complied with. Until elections are held in accordance with those acts, the law of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, approved March 15, 1867, which provides for the continuance in the performance of their duties of those persons whose term of office would otherwise have expired, will govern all cases except those which may be specially acted upon at these Headquarters.

By command of Major Gen. P. H. Sheridan.
Geo. L. HARTSUFF,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Gen. Beauregard on the Situation.

HE COUNSELS SUBMISSION.

We give below an interesting and important letter from the pen of that influential gentleman and skillful engineer, Gen. G. T. Beauregard, written in response to a request made to him and others through the columns of this journal. In common with many of the great men of the world who devote their attention to matters of science, either practical or theoretical, Gen. Beauregard felt a modest hesitation about publishing his opinions on questions which are commonly considered as altogether political in their bearing. The importance of his friends, however, added to the momentous character of the issues involved, decided him at length to yield to the respectful solicitation tendered in the premises, and the counsels which he now gives will be found fully in keeping with his straightforward record as a soldier and a man. He advises a calm and dignified submission to the severe demands which have been made by Congress and looks forward hopefully to the time when the negro "can be made to take sufficient interest in the affairs and prosperity of the South to ensure an intelligent vote on his part."

NEW ORLEANS, March 21, 1867.
Wm. H. C. King, Editor of the New Orleans Times, New Orleans, La.:
Dear Sir—You have done me the honor to call for my opinion relative to the action of the South under the Military Bill. Having seldom taken any part in politics, I do not feel well qualified to advise on so momentous a question; nevertheless, as the same desire to obtain my views has been manifested from various quarters, I shall not shrink from the responsibility of expressing them, in the hope that they may tend to quiet the public mind, so justly alarmed at this moment.

In my humble opinion, we have but one of two things to do—yield or submit; the first is inadmissible, in our painfully exhausted condition. Four years of a desperate war have taught us that the "argument of the sword" can no longer be resorted to by us to redress our grievances. We must, therefore, submit; but with that calm dignity becoming our manhood and our long independence.

Having been overpowered in the late struggle, we can submit to the harsh and ungenerous conditions of our conquerors without dishonor, and we must adopt the least of two evils; a futile resistance would only cause our rivets to be driven closer; we must then acquiesce or leave the country. But we love too dearly the land of our birth to abandon it in its hour of severest trial. We should avoid, also, bringing it, by internal dissensions, to the condition of poor Mexico, and the unfortunate South American Republics.

With regard to the suffrage of the freedmen, however objectionable it may be at present, it is an element of strength for the future. If properly handled and directed, we shall defeat our adversaries with their own weapon.

The negro is Southern born; with a little education and some property qualifications, he can be made to take sufficient interest in the affairs and prosperity of the South to insure an intelligent vote on his part.

In our future political contests with the North, on protective tariffs, internal improvements, etc., the freedmen of the South will side with the whites of the South and of the West, and they will thus contribute to give us back the influence we formerly had in the councils of the nation.

Our people should understand that the Radicals can remain in power only so long as the public excitement is kept up; as with the turbid waters of the Mississippi river, the sedimentary particles are kept up at the surface only so long as the waters are in motion; the instant the current is checked those particles fall to the bottom. Thus will it be with the Radicals, when peace and quiet are restored to the country; the Conservatives will then take the reins in their own hands, and the constitutional laws of the land will once more prevail.

I remain, yours respectfully,
G. T. BEAUREGARD.

LOUISIANA LEGISLATURE.

The following important Report was presented in the Senate from the Joint Special Committee on Federal relations. It is an address full of good sense, and we hope that it will be carefully read and its advice heeded.

The recent action of Congress in the passage of the measures, commonly known as the "military reconstruction bill" and the "supplemental bill," precipitates upon the people the consideration of most momentous questions, affecting not merely their present and future welfare, but involving the very political existence of the State.

It seems evident that active steps will be at once taken for the reorganization of our State government in accordance with the principles of those measures, and that general elections will be speedily held for that purpose.

In this emergency it becomes absolutely necessary for the people to determine forthwith what line of conduct is most proper for them to pursue.

Your representatives in the general assembly have not failed to give to this question the most anxious and earnest deliberation.

The subject matter is placed beyond the pale of our legislative action, by a power over which we have no control, but we feel it our duty to give our constituents the results of our sober and serious reflection, and to advise them as to the course we think they should adopt under the circumstances.

Whatever may be our opinions of the justice, magnanimity or constitutionality of those congressional measures, they are imposed upon us by an authority which we have clearly no power to resist, and we, therefore, solemnly believe it becomes our duty, not only to abstain from fruitless and factious opposition, but to exert all our power and influence so to direct events as that the least harm may come to the State from their execution.

We, therefore, exhort the people to organize thoroughly and take an active part in all elections, under whatever authority they may be held. Avoid all semblance of opposition to the free and fair suffrage of every man having the right to vote under the authority of Congress.

Let there be no collisions or collisions of any kind.

Avoid discussions among yourselves. Bring forward as candidates, citizens in whose wisdom, discretion, and courage you can place implicit confidence, and whose qualifications shall conform, as far as practicable, to the requirements of Congress. Suppress, as far as possible, the consideration of all questions which may lead to division of opinion among you.

Look to the characters of the men whom you elect. Do not seek to bind them in advance by any particular course of policy, the wisdom and propriety of which must at last be determined by the "legis of events," but leave them free and untrammelled to act as their judgments may dictate, for the interest and honor of the State.

Let moderation and temperance guide you in counsel and conduct. Restrain and control the ebullitions of inconsiderate, rash and turbulent men, who may precipitate collisions from which nothing but injury to the State and people can possibly result.

Use all fair and legitimate means within your power so to influence and direct the suffrage as to elect trustworthy men to office, and thereby to prevent the power of the State from falling into unworthy hands; but at the same time secure that your choice shall be respected, and that the men so chosen shall be clothed with authority which none can question.

In following out the course of action here indicated you will be called on to exercise a spirit of extreme tolerance and forbearance; but we believe it to be the only course consistent with our present condition and the safety of the State, and you will not hesitate at any sacrifice necessary to that end.

In conclusion, we would say that we place an abiding confidence in the people, and believe that by the exercise of wisdom, prudence and patriotism, they will so conduct the State through the ordeal as to command the respect of friends and foes.

M. A. FORT, Chairman Senate Committee.
L. M. NUTT, Chairman House Committee.

Result of the First Election under the Military Law.

This pleases us, and is not altogether unexpected. On the 21st inst., an election, as we were informed by the Montgomery Advertiser, which got its intelligence from the North Carolina newspapers, came off at Newbern, that State. The negroes came to the polls and voted with the whites. There appear to have been no Northern and Southern candidates struggling for office, and the negroes, true to the soil that gave them birth, true to old recollections, voted, we are told, unanimously for a Southern candidate. This is a triumph, surely, and one which, vaunting philanthropic idealism may well shed bitter but availing tears. It is a very suggestive commentary, we may add, that incendiary work, "Uncle Sam's Cabin," and other literature that ilk.

LATEST NEWS.

WASHINGTON, March 25. — A Republican caucus was held to-night for the purpose of adjournment was discussed. A thorough reorganization for a campaign North and South was effected. The committee consists of one member from each State.

Executive session to-day there was one confirmation and two rejections.

Senator Wilson in reference to the Southern States.

WASHINGTON, March 25. — The following is Senator Wilson's letter: WASHINGTON, MARCH 25, 1867.

My dear Sir, — In reply to your letter, "Does the law as it now stands disfranchise the rank and file of the soldiers who had never sworn an oath to support the Constitution of the United States?" I say that it does not disfranchise them. The Constitutional amendment disqualifies from holding office certain persons who have sworn an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and engaged in the rebellion or aid and comfort to it. This class of persons are disfranchised, and all other persons are entitled to the same rights and comforts to it. Those persons are mentioned in the constitutional amendment, so all persons will know who are qualified and disfranchised.

WASHINGTON, March 28, 1867. — The resolutions of the Maryland convention of Maryland for a Republican government was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The bill authorizing the Secretary of War to employ two dredges to keep open the mouth of the Mississippi passed. It goes to the President.

The Maryland Republican Convention were presented.

Mr. Thomas said there was intense excitement in Maryland, but doubted its leading to bloodshed. He argued the right of Congress to seize the State, particularly as it lay around the District, and pass an enabling act, thus guaranteeing equal rights. He denied that there was any Republican Government in Maryland.

Mr. Brooks argued elaborately against the right of Congressional interference. He asserted that in Tennessee and Missouri there was no more republicanism than in Egypt.

The resolutions were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

House—Butler and Bingham, in personal explanations, assailed each other furiously. Butler said he had examined the evidence in the trial of the assassination conspirators for another purpose than that of proving Mrs. Surratt's unjustifiable hanging. He said the memorandum book in which Booth kept, day by day, his thoughts, plans, and motives, was taken from his dead body, though his pipe, spurs and knife, were presented in court. This memorandum book was in possession of the Judiciary Committee, with eighteen pages of entries, made ready for the Bridegroom. His coming was no surprise. She has gone into the bridal chamber, and is now feasting on that heavenly banquet, prepared by our blessed Saviour. Oh! that we may all be ready, as she was, and in the end be partakers of that feast!

We have mentioned that she was a friend to the ministers. 'Twas her peculiar delight to have these men of God to visit her house. And it was theirs, as soon as they knew her to go. There was not only a feast of the good things of this life, and something with which to fill the empty pocket, but, far better, there was always in readiness, a rich spiritual feast, of which they could partake freely, and go away feeling refreshed, and strengthened for their duties. She always added to their stock, and that with no sparing hand. To fill her part in church on days of worship, was always her pride and delight, and like Aaron and Hur, she was ever holding up the hands of the Lord's soldiers, while they fought against the adversaries of His Kingdom. The church in Vernon has lost a great deal. None but God can fill her place. He alone can "of these things raise up, seed unto Abraham."

Her husband, now old and gray headed, is truly lonely and bereaved. For fifty-five years, these two have walked hand in hand over the rugged hills, and through the green and fertile valleys of life; gathering flowers always everywhere. There was always a rich, beautiful garden, where they could retire from life's cares, and have their hearts refreshed by the sweet odors of conjugal affection. They were always happy in each other's love. And their conjugal example was an object of emulation, to all the young couples who knew them.

Early in their life, they erected in their house an altar to the Lord, and they made it a business to assemble their family around this altar, for morning and evening worship. And it must be, and has been a great consolation and reward to them, to see all their children and grand-children growing up in the way of holiness, all striving to follow in the footsteps of their sainted mother, the light that has gone before. She was worthy of their imitation, and may they all, through the favor of God, become as bright, and holy as she was, and when they have passed from this life, all be assembled around the great central light in Heaven.

Capt. JAMES WALTON, son of Mrs. Louisa and the late Rev. James Walton, of the Mississippi Conference, was a Methodist, a professor of religion, and a soldier of the Confederacy.

He was a native of Mississippi, born in the village of Starkville, Nov. 30th, 1839, was reared in Holmes county, Miss., by one of the best of fathers, and the parent of mothers. The writer of this notice, knew him in the sunny days of his childhood. And the memory of him then, remains an ideal of the beautiful of childhood, his sweet innocent face, together with his retiring steady and studious habits, marked him a boy to be loved. His constant obedience, and the pure manliness of his childhood, not only honored his father, but grew to be a power over him, until James became to be the idol of his hopes.

In the sixteenth year of his age, he professed religion, and joined the church of his father. He was a Christian, from the day of his conversion until his death. He had just completed his collegiate course of studies at the University of Mississippi as the contest for Southern Independence began. On the 8th of Aug. 1861, he attached himself as an independent volunteer to the 18th Miss. Regiment. After the battle of Leburg, Va., in which he participated, he returned to Mississippi, and assisted in raising a company of volunteers, and was elected second lieutenant, of the same. His Capt. being promoted, and the first Lieut. killed, Lieut. Walton was commissioned Capt. of Co. K of the 29th Mississippi Regiment. He served through old house, on the morning of the 20th. Her health had been declining gradually for many months. The morning of her death, at the usual hour for family worship, she sent for her husband to come in, and said to him, "It is time to go to prayer." These were her last words. In a very few moments, perhaps not more than one, her spirit, without premonition, without a struggle, without a disturbance of the body, silently, quietly, and sweetly plumed its wings, and soared away to its Saviour's bosom. What a glorious death to die! and what a rich legacy, is her last words to her mourning friends! Prayer, the strong arm which had so long borne her up, the key which she had so often used in opening God's store-house of blessings, was her last best gift; which will be as potent in giving strength and consolation to them, and which will open to them the treasures of this world, and of that to come. No doubt in this last moment, this glorious key opened for her, the portals of heaven, and spread out to her enraptured view, a realization of those blissful delights which she had so often foretasted here. She was truly a wise virgin. For nearly fifty years, she had had her lamp trimmed and burning, ready for the Bridegroom. His coming was no surprise. She has gone into the bridal chamber, and is now feasting on that heavenly banquet, prepared by our blessed Saviour. Oh! that we may all be ready, as she was, and in the end be partakers of that feast!

WASHINGTON, March 22, 1867. — But, oh! didn't Mr. Bingham catch it when the bottled-up hero got up. B. Butler moved straight on by attacking his weak points. He drew a picture of the Surratt trial in his very best vein, and held up Judge Bingham to execration, as a Judge whose skirts were stained with the blood of innocent victims. "Victims!" he screamed, jumping up in the aisle, "who talks of victims? The only victim of the gentleman's powers that I know of was an innocent woman, hanged in a bag, with a hood over her face! Victims! Why his only victim in the whole war was poor Mrs. Surratt. Victims, is it? Yes, I can sustain the memory of Fort Fisher if he and his associates can sustain him in the guilt of the blood of a woman tried by a military commission and condemned without sufficient evidence!"

Mr. Bingham tried to reply to this, but the effort was in vain. He made a frantic denial that "the blood of innocence was on his hands," but his manner was that of a man who believed that it was there, and that it was a "damned spot" that would not "come off."

During the course of this debate, B. Butler and the man Corode, from Pennsylvania, whom I have mentioned before, and who is a very poor imitation of Thaddeus Stevens, without any of the learning, wit or good breeding of the latter, disgraced themselves and the House by retaining the low slanders about the alleged cruelty of Southern people to prisoners, which have long since been exploded as base and groundless falsehoods. In this dirty, too, Mr. Spaulding joined.

RINDERHOOD.

Mr. Editor: Our community has been very suddenly overspread by a cloud of sadness. And we have no doubt that there will be sorrow and sadness in the hearts of many of our old and young citizens, when they hear that one of their oldest and best friends, a fellow-laborer in the army of the Lord, has received his discharge, and gone to her reward in heaven.

Sister GUSTAVE KEARNEY, who has lived so long near Vernon, Madison county, Miss., who was so extensively known as the pious, zealous, working Christian, as the friend to the preachers, to the poor, and to every one, has ended her happy and useful mission here, and gone to rest with the saints above; and to-day, while we are mourning below, there is joy with the angels in Heaven. She died at their

Gen. Bragg's Tennessee and Kentucky campaign, was wounded at Murfreesboro, Ky., and seriously wounded on the mud-lough-field of Murfreesboro, Tenn. His last wound disabled him. But so soon as he could walk, with the aid of a cane, he rejoined the army at Shelbyville, Tenn., and in consequence of his lameness, was made Provost Marshal of Gen. Withers' Division on the field. At the battle of Chickamauga, he served on Gen. Hindman's staff. Exposure and fatigue on the field, which with him, was always the price of duty, retired him to the army hospital, at Marietta, Va., where he lingered from September until the 9th day of November, 1863, when in great peace of mind, and joys that filled him with celestial raptures, he laid aside the dusty robes of duty for the shining garments of an endless praise.

These are the outward facts, in the life of this young man. They grow tame in the presence of his real worth. For young Walton was an earnest and real man. In his friendships in his religion, in his patriotism, he was always in earnest, pure, and above suspicion. Whatever duties they imposed, were recognized and discharged with great fidelity. He was a man of action, quiet and firm, and constantly obeying the highest principles of duty and honor, he was a noble contrast to a fruitless life of noisy sentiments, and empty professions. He did not talk religion, but did justly, loved mercy, and walked humbly with his God. His fidelity to duty, his impartiality, as an officer, his humility and purity of life, as a Christian, his gentle, polite, and retiring manners, and his coolness and courage, in the presence of danger, commanded the love and confidence of his soldiers, was the admiration of his regiment, the confidence and respect of his superior officers. By them, he was quoted as example, worthy of all imitation. His life was a noble illustration to those who knew him best, that there was a real and impressive power in his religious character, that rises above all the intrigues of selfish ambition, in the estimates of man, and claims their homage and confidence. He had the moral independence to do right, fear God, and walk humbly before him, and leave all the consequences, as to place and position in the army, and life, to the low ambition of self-seeking men, and thus, he became the favorite of all.

The loss of such men to the South, was a greater loss than the conflagration of a hundred cities, and the munitioning of four millions of slaves.

There are few better examples in history, which, to illustrate the sufficiency of the gospel, to meet the religious wants of men, than the life of Capt. Walton furnishes.

Religion finds in him an evidence, both of its power and reality, whether on the long and weary march, or on the field of carnage and blood, or lying in groaning hospitals, which tracked the march of desolating armies. Religion supported his fortitude, rendered his courage steady, and gave him honor amid destructions, and afforded the comforts of that peace of mind, which God has promised to all of his people.

The death scene of Capt. Walton, was as sublime as his life had been real and earnest.

Mrs. Baker, of Marietta, Ga., says in a letter of Christian condolence, to his mother, that "in compliance with a request made by her, of the Rev. Wm. P. Miller, of the Presbyterian church, of M., he furnishes the following statement: 'Captain Walton, manifested throughout his sickness, the greatest resignation and composure, his intellect was unclouded, and when brought low he always seemed fully aware of his danger.' His uniform testimony was that the Saviour appeared an all sufficient and precious Saviour. He was remarkably free from doubt, was kept in perfect peace, filled with the love of God, and assured of eternal life. A few days before his death, when I found him growing so much worse, he told me, shaking his head, and with his peculiar, earnest look, that he should never recover, I spoke to him of the faithful ear, even in the dark valley of the Good Shepherd, and of his assurance of dwelling in the house of God, forever. 'Ah! Blessed Home,' said he. I then asked him if he had any fear, he answered with emphasis, 'not a particle, not a particle.' Before his death, he seemed to realize the unclouded splendor of the life immortal. Said an intelligent but irreligious man who witnessed the composure to the triumph of his last hours, that, 'the death of Capt. Walton is an unspeakable argument in favor of the Christian religion.'

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

Since the issue of our last weekly review, the general market has exhibited a more liberal degree of animation, and several of the leading articles have undergone a quotable alteration. There has been a moderate demand for Sugar and Molasses, at easier prices for the former, and the movement in Western Produce has been to a fair extent, Corn and Flour under heavy receipts, disclosing less stability, while a steady feeling has characterized operations in Pork, Oats and Bacon, transactions in the latter being confined to the retail business. The demand for our leading staple has been more general, and under the favorable influence of a sharp reaction at Liverpool, factors have been enabled to impart an improved feeling to prices, the market closing yesterday at our quotations, with a firm feeling.

COTTON—On Saturday the demand was restricted throughout, the majority of buyers being unwilling to operate unless at concessions, which factors showed little disposition to grant, and consequently the sales were light, attaining barely 2750 bales, at softer prices. On Monday the opening was quiet, but after the receipt of the foreign advices, quite a brisk movement set in, and notwithstanding holders materially advanced their pretensions, yet a fair business was transacted, comprising 5000 bales, at prices showing a net gain of 1/2¢ per lb. Yesterday the market opened quiet, and, owing to the indisposition of buyers to accede to the claims of holders, the movement continued restricted throughout, and consequently only 2500 bales changed hands at previous prices, the market closing firm at our quotations.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 12,250 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export. The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 6992 bales, against 8963 during the corresponding period last week, showing a decrease of 2271 bales. The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 619,062 bales, against 553,283 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 86,148 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 84,508 bales to Great Britain, of 25,350 to France, and an increase of 18,313 bales to other foreign ports.

TOBACCO—The stock is too small to allow of any scope for operations, and the sales since our last review were consequently confined to a few hogheads. Prices are very full, and we continue to quote:

	Light.	Heavy.
Low Refused.	27 to 27 1/2	27 to 27 1/2
Good do.	28 to 28 1/2	28 to 28 1/2

Fine do.	32 to 32 1/2	32 to 32 1/2
Choice do.	33 to 33 1/2	33 to 33 1/2

FLOUR—Supplies have come in more freely and prices have been a little easier for buyers. There were sales on Saturday and Monday of 3800 barrels at $10 50 to $10 75 for Low Fine, $12 25 for Superfine, $12 75 for Single Extra, $13 50 to $13 75 for Double Extra, $15 50 to $15 75 for Treble Extra and $16 to $16 50 for choice. Yesterday the sales embraced 2000 barrels at the foregoing prices. Arrived during the past three days 18,823 bbls. Cleared for Florida 450, Texas 831, Matamoros 200 bbls.

MONETARY.
Since our last publication, there has been more activity noticeable in the Coin market, with very little irregularity characterizing the course of prices. On Saturday Gold opened at 134 1/2, but improved at a late hour, and closed steady at 134 1/2 to 135; it opened on Monday at 134 1/2, subsequently receding, afterwards rallying and closing firm at 134 1/2; and opened yesterday at 134 1/2, but later intelligence from New York being favorable, it improved and closed firm at 134 1/2 to 134 3/4.

WHOLE NUMBER 321.

NEW ORLEANS, SATURDAY, APRIL 6, 1867.

($3.00 A YEAR IN ADVANCE.
OFFICE—112 CAMP STREET.

HONDURAS.

BELEZE, November 2, 1866.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to address you upon a subject of great concern to many, and consider, of momentous importance to the future welfare and prosperity of this Colony, and trust I will be excused for trespassing upon your valuable time, and accept, if you please, as my apology, for so doing, the assurance that I am actuated by a sincere desire to subserve the best interest, and if possible promote the welfare of all those who may wish to avail themselves of such advantages, as the nature, judgment and wise consideration of your excellency may deem expedient to offer to emigrants coming to the country.

An intelligent, experienced, and most useful class of agriculturists, who were formerly prosperous and happy in the United States, have had their family circles broken, their property destroyed, or greatly depreciated in value by the late civil war, as to render it most impossible for them to reculture there under existing circumstances.

Many hundreds of unfortunate families lured by the glowing representations made to them, of the advantages which unstable governments proffered to emigrants, and the little that was left them, adduced to their old homesteads, the graves of their Fathers and Mothers, and sought refuge in Mexico and other countries, to which their attention had been directed by misfortune.

The distracted state of those countries has entailed upon many a loss of the remnant of their fortunes which they carried with them, and compelled them, as a last resort, to return to their old homes, or to remain in their adopted country, enduring poverty and want; consequently I make no statements upon such subjects which are not sanctioned by your excellency.

I do not profess to represent by authority, or otherwise, any man, or men, but desire that the thousands in different sections of the United States, who are eagerly inquiring where they can find a home for themselves and families, be informed upon what terms they will be admitted to the enjoyment of their rights of person and property, under your benign and peaceful government, which gives the protection of the powerful Imperial government of Great Britain.

Upon what terms can the immigrants seeking your shores, obtain lands in such tracts as will be their want and purposes?

Any who would gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of being here, who have heretofore enjoyed affluent fortunes, will be induced by circumstances, and their household effects, family stores, fashions, cattle, etc., etc., and a plentiful amount of cash capital which they may bring with them to pay their current expenses to be expended in opening and settling a place for a future home, would constitute all of their earthly possessions. To such a class the payment of the customs duties of their property would be a great inconvenience, and in many instances exceedingly onerous.

In your Excellency guaranteeing any relief from or abatement in the rate of these exactions, your profound interest with which studies in the United States, this subject impels me most respectfully to ask of your excellency, the privilege of publishing my reply in the public journals of the country, as it is by that means that the information can reach those for whom alone it is desired.

I have the honor to be very respectfully, your excellency's most obedient servant.

JAS. M. PUTNAM.

To His Excellency

J. GARDNER AUSTIN.

Lieutenant Governor of British Honduras.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, Nov. 4, 1866.

MR. SPEAKER: I have the honor to enclose herewith the copy of a letter received from Mr. Putnam, having reference to the settlement of agriculturalists with their families in this colony, together with certain resolutions bearing on the same subject—submitted to the Court of Policy of British Guiana, all of which may be considered with advantage to British Honduras, when the establishment of steam communication between Belize and New Orleans is under discussion.

So important, in my opinion, is the introduction of practical planters to the rising agricultural interest of the colony, that I shall, as far as in my power, most cordially concur in any arrangements, having for their objects not only the admission of stock and furniture without duty, but also the grants of free passages—the free grants of land, and the advance of money on moderate interest for the erection of houses, and the cultivation of the lands allotted.

Resolutions referred to in Lieutenant Governor's Message, No. 2.

1. That from the sparseness of its present population, the productive capabilities of British Guiana, are not sufficiently developed, and any project having for its object the increase of the population and the supply of the great want of the country, labor, deserves the encouragement of this court.

2. That such a wide area of fertile land, which a bountiful Providence has placed at the disposal of the British Crown, would present an attractive colonizing field to many who now inhabit densely populated countries, were the advantages afforded by British Guiana made known, and encouragement held out to free settlers.

3. That no colony offers a more profitable investment for capital, and were the Crown lands thus settled, a wider scope would be afforded for its beneficial employment in the formation or extension of canals, tramways, steam communication, the electric telegraph, etc., and this court therefore recommends to the government the consideration of the question of having the Crown lands (in certain localities to be hereinafter determined on) surveyed and laid out in plots, due regard being had to highways and roads, with the view of making free grants of them to settlers, upon conditions which will ensure their cultivation within a given period.

4. That in anticipation of the revenues that must arise from the increased population, giving increased production, in the opinion of this court it is sound policy to foster and aid all undertakings which, although at first tending apparently only to the advantage of the few, yet eventually and really contribute to the well-being of the many; and this court therefore will authorize advances of money (upon moderate interest, and repayable by easy instalments) to the free settlers upon Crown lands for the erection of houses and for draining and bringing into cultivation the land so allotted to them; such advances to be expended under official inspection, and to form a first lien upon the land and buildings, until repaid with interest.

5. That the principle of raising loans of a reproductive character having been already affirmed, and for the purpose of enabling the government to carry out the objects indicated; this court authorizes the issue from time to time, in such sums as occasions may require, but not in the whole to exceed £1,000,000 sterling; Government Debentures bearing interest,—payable half-yearly, at or under the rate of six per centum per annum, to be secured upon the revenues of the colony, not already pledged in security for existing loans.

THE ALBERT NYANZA

Jan. 19.—At 8 A. M., we emerged from the apparently endless regions of marsh and grass, and saw on the right bank large herds of cattle, tended by naked natives, in a country abounding with high grass and mimosa wood. At 9.15 A. M., arrived at the Zareba, or station of Binder, an Austrian subject, and White Nile trader; here we found five niggers belonging to him and his partner. Binder's valet insisted upon giving a bullock to my people. This bullock I resisted for some time, until I saw that the man was affronted. It is impossible to procure from the natives any cattle by purchase. The country is now a swamp, but it will be passable during the dry season. Took equal altitudes of sun producing latitude 7° 58' 46". The misery of these unfortunate blacks is beyond description; they will not kill their cattle, neither do they taste meat unless an animal dies of sickness; they will not work, thus they frequently starve, existing only upon rats, lizards, snakes, and upon such fish as they can spear. The spearing of fish is a mere hazard, as they cast the harpoon at random among the reeds; thus, out of three or four hundred casts, they may, by good luck, strike a fish. The harpoon is neatly made, and is attached to a pliable reed about twenty feet long, secured by a long line. Occasionally they strike a monster, as there are varieties of fish which attain a weight of two hundred pounds. In the event of harpooning such a fish, a long and exciting chase is the result, as he carries away the harpoon, and runs out the entire length of line; they then swim after him, holding their end of the line, and playing him until exhausted.

The chief of this tribe (the Kyth) wore a leopardskin across his shoulders, and a skull-cap of white beads, with a crest of white ostrich-feathers; but the mantle was merely slung over his shoulders, and all other parts of his person were naked. His daughter was the best looking girl that I have seen among the blacks; she was about sixteen. Her clothing consisted of a little piece of dressed hide about a foot wide slung across her shoulders, all other parts being exposed. All the girls of this country wear merely a circlet of little iron jingling ornaments round their waists. They came in numbers, bringing small bundles of wood to exchange for a few handfuls of corn. Most of the men are tall, but wretchedly thin; the children are mere skeletons, and the entire tribe appears thoroughly starved. The language is that of the Dinka. The chief carried a curious tobacco-box, an iron spike about two feet long, with a hollow socket, bound with iguana-skin; this served for either tobacco-box, club, or dagger. Throughout the whole of this marshy country it is curious to observe the number of white anthills standing above the water in the marshes; these Babel towers save their inmates from the deluge; working during the dry season, the white ants carry their hills to so great a height (about ten feet), that they can live securely in the upper stories during the floods. The whole day we are beset by crowds of starving people, bringing small gourd-shells to receive the expected corn. The people of this tribe are mere apes, trusting entirely to the productions of nature for their subsistence; they will spend hours in digging out field-mice from their burrows, as we should for rabbits. They are the most pitiable set of savages that can be imagined; so emaciated, that they have no visible posterior; they look as though they had been planed off, and their long thin legs and arms give them a peculiar gnat-like appearance. At night they crouch close to the fires, lying in the smoke to escape the clouds of mosquitoes. At this season the country is a vast swamp, the only dry spots being the white ant-hills; in such places the natives herd like wild animals, simply rubbing themselves with wood-ashes to keep out the cold.

Jan. 20th.—The river from this spot turns sharp to the east, but an arm equally broad comes from S. 20° E. to this point. There is no stream from this arm. The main stream runs round the angle with a rapid current of about two and a half miles per hour. The natives say that this arm of dead water extends for three or four days' sailing, and is then lost in the high reeds. My reis Diabbi declares this to be a mere backwater, and that it is not connected with the main river by any positive channel.

So miserable are the natives of the Kyth tribe, that they devour both skins and bones of all dead animals; the bones are pounded between stones, and when reduced to powder they are boiled to a kind of porridge; nothing is left even for a fly to feed upon, when an animal either dies a natural death, or is killed. I never pitied poor creatures more than these utterly destitute savages; their method of returning thanks is by holding your hand and affecting to spit upon it; which operation they do not actually perform, as I have seen stated in works upon the White Nile. Their domestic arrangements are peculiar. Polygamy is of course allowed, as in all other hot climates and savage countries; but when a man becomes too old to pay sufficient attention to his numerous young wives, the eldest son takes the place of his father and becomes his substitute. To every herd of cattle there is a sacred bull who is supposed to exert an influence over the prosperity of the flocks; his horns are ornamented with tufts of feathers, and frequently with small bells, and he invariably leads the great herd to pasture. On starting in the early morning from the cattle kraal the natives address the bull, telling him "to watch over the herd; to keep the cows from straying; and to lead them to the sweetest pastures, so that they shall give abundance of milk," etc.

Jan. 21st.—Last night a sudden squall carried away Koorshid Aga's mast by the deck, leaving him a complete wreck. The weather today is dull, oppressive, and dead calm. As usual, endless marshes, and mosquitoes. I never either saw or heard of so disgusting a country as that bordering the White Nile from Khartoum to this point. Course S.E. as nearly as I can judge, but the endless windings, and the absence of any mark as a point, make it difficult to give it an accurate course—the river about a hundred yards in width of clear water; alive with floating vegetation, with a current of about two miles per hour.

Jan. 22.—The luxuries of the country as usual—malaria, marshes, mosquitoes, misery; far as the eye can reach, vast treeless marshes perfectly lifeless. At times progressing slowly by towing, the men struggling through the water with the rope; at other times by running round the boat in a circle, pulling with their hands at the grass, which thus acts like the cogs of a wheel to move us gradually forward. One of my horses, "Filfil," out of pure amusement kicks at the men as they pass, and having succeeded several times in kicking them into the river, he perseveres in the fun, I believe for lack of other employment.

Hippopotami are heard snorting in the high reeds both day and night, but we see very few. The black women on board are daily quarrelling together and fighting like bull-dogs; little Gaddum Her is a regular black toy terrier, rather old, wonderfully strong, very short, but making up in spirit for what she lacks in stature; she is the quintessence of vice, being ready for a stand-up fight at the shortest notice. On one occasion she fought with her antagonist until both fell down the hold, smashing all my water jars; on another day they both fell into the river. The end of this wretched voyage appears to try the temper of both man and beast; the horses, donkeys, and camels are constantly fighting and biting at all around.

Jan. 23.—At 8 A. M. arrived at Aboukooka, the establishment of a French trader. It is impossible to describe the misery of the land; in the midst of the vast expanse of marsh is a little plot of dry ground about thirty-five yards square, and within thirty yards of the river, but to be reached only by wading through the swamp. The establishment consisted of about a dozen straw huts, occupied by a wretched fever-stricken set of people; the valet, and others employed, came to the boats to beg for corn. I stopped for ten minutes at the charming watering-place Aboukooka to obtain the news of the country. The current at this point is as usual very strong, being upwards of two and a half miles per hour; the river is quite bank full although not actually flooding, the windings endless; one moment our course is due north, then east, then again north, and as suddenly due south; in fact, we face every point of the compass within an hour. Frequently the niggers that are far in the rear appear in advance; it is a heart-breaking river without a single redeeming point; I do not wonder at the failure of all expeditions in this wretched country. There is a breeze to-day, thus the oppressive heat and stagnated marsh atmosphere is relieved. I have always remarked that when the sky is clouded we suffer more from heat and oppression than when the day is clear; there is a weight in the atmosphere that would be interesting if tested by the barometer.

The water is excessively bad throughout the White Nile, especially between the Shillook and the Kyth tribes; that of the Bahr-Gazal is even worse. The reis Diabbi tells me that the north wind always fails between the Nuehr and the upper portion of the Kyth. I could not believe that so miserable a country existed as the whole of this land. There is no game to be seen at this season, few birds, and not even crocodiles show themselves; all the water-animals are hidden in the high grass; thus there is absolutely nothing living to be seen, but day after day is passed in wading slowly through the labyrinth of endless marsh, through clouds of mosquitoes.

At 4.20 P. M. arrived at the Austrian mission-station at St. Croix, and delivered a letter to the chief of the establishment, Herr Moorlang.

Jan. 24.—Took observations of the sun, making latitude 6° 39'.

The mission-station consists of about twenty grass huts on a patch of dry ground close to the river. The church is a small hut, but neatly arranged. Herr Moorlang acknowledged, with great feeling, that the mission was absolutely useless among such savages; that he had worked with much zeal for many years, but that the natives were utterly impracticable. They were far below the brutes, as the latter show signs of affection to those who are kind to them; while the natives, on the contrary, are utterly obtuse to all feelings of gratitude. He described the people as lying and deceitful to a superlative degree; the more they receive the more they desire, but in return they will do nothing.

Twenty or thirty of these disgusting, ash-smearing, stark naked brutes, armed with clubs of hard wood brought to a point, were lying idly about the station. The mission having given up the White Nile as a total failure, Herr Moorlang sold the whole village and mission-station to Koorshid Aga this morning for 3000 piastres, £30! I purchased a horse of the missionaries for 1000 piastres, which I christened "Priest," as coming from the mission; he is a good-looking animal, and has been used to the gun, as the unfortunate Baron Harnier rode his buffalo-hunting. This good sportsman was a Prussian nobleman, who, with two European attendants, had for some time amused himself by collecting objects of natural history and shooting in this neighborhood. Both his Europeans succumbed to marsh fever. The end of Baron Harnier was exceedingly tragic. Having wounded a buffalo, the animal charged a native attendant and threw him to the ground; and with great courage he attacked the buffalo, with the butt-end of his rifle to rescue the man then beneath the animal's horns. The buffalo left the man and turned upon his new assailant. The native, far from assisting his master, who had thus jeopardized his life to save him, fled from the spot. The unfortunate baron was found by the missionaries trampled and gored into an undistinguishable mass; and the dead body of the buffalo was found at a short distance, the animal having been mortally wounded. I went to see the grave of this brave Prussian, who had thus sacrificed so noble a life for so worthless an object as a cowardly native. It had been well cared for by the kind hands of the missionaries, and was protected by thorn-bushes laid around it, but I fear it will be neglected now that the mission has fallen into unholy hands. It is a pitiable sight to witness the self-sacrifice that many noble men have made in these frightful countries without any good results. Near to the grave of Baron Harnier are those of several members of the mission, who have left their bones in this horrid land, while not one convert has been made from the mission of St. Croix.

The river divides into two branches, about five miles above this station, forming an island. Upon this is a fishing-station of the natives; the native name of the spot is Pomone. The country is swampy and scantily covered with bushes and small trees, but no actual timber. As usual, the entire country is dead, flat; it abounds with elephants a few miles inland. Herr Moorlang describes the whole of the White Nile traders as a mere colony of robbers, who pillage and shoot the natives at discretion.

On the opposite side of the river there is a large neglected garden, belonging to the mission. Although the soil is extremely rich, neither grapes nor pomegranate will succeed; they bear fruit, but of a very acid flavour. Dates blossom, but will not fruit.

Anecdote of Frederick the Great.

One of Frederick the Great's best generals was Hans Joachim Von Zieten, commonly known in Prussia as "Father Zieten," or the "Hussar King."

Zieten was never ashamed of his faith. On every occasion he professed it, before high and low. Once he declined an invitation to come to his royal master's table, because on that day he wished to present himself at the table of his Lord and Master Jesus Christ. It was sacrament day. The next time he appeared at the palace the King, whose infidel tendencies were well known, made use of some profane expressions about the holy communion of the Lord's Supper, and the other guests laughed.

Zieten shook his gray head solemnly, stood up saluted the King, and then said, with a firm voice:

"Your Majesty knows well, that in war I have never feared any danger, and everywhere have boldly risked my life for you and my country. I am still animated by the same spirit, and to-day, if it were necessary, and your Majesty commanded it, would lay my gray head at your feet. But there is One above us who is greater than you or I—greater than all men. He is the Saviour and Redeemer, who has died also for your Majesty, and has dearly bought us all with his own blood. This Holy One I can never allow to be mocked or insulted; for on him repose my faith, my comfort and my hope, in life and in death. In the power of this faith your brave army has courageously fought and conquered. If your Majesty undermines this faith, you undermine at the same time, the welfare of the State. This is undoubtedly true. I salute your Majesty."

The noble old soldier having thus concluded his bold testimony for his Divine Master, of whom he was not ashamed, sat down.

This open confession of his Saviour silenced the scoffers, and evidently made a powerful impression on the King. He felt he had been wrong in his attack on the faith of his General, and he was not ashamed to acknowledge it. He gave his hand to Zieten—his right hand, placing his left on the old man's shoulder—and said, with emotion:

"O, happy Zieten, how I wish I could also believe it! I have the greatest respect for your religion; hold it fast. This shall never happen again."

The King then rose from the table, dismissed his other guests, but said to Zieten—

"Come with me into my cabinet."

What passed in that conference, with closed doors, between the great king and his greater general, no one has ever learned. But this we know, that the Lord's own words are now verified to Zieten—"Whoever shall confess Me before men, him will I confess before My Father which is in heaven."

The New York Sun says: "A committee appointed by the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, to inquire into the condition of the South, report that about five thousand persons in the single county of Cherokee, Ala., are wholly without the necessities of life." Other States in the South are nearly as badly off as Alabama, being literally in a condition of famine. And still New York has contributed but about fifty thousand dollars to the relief of this vast amount of suffering.

FUNERAL OF BISHOP SOULE.

ADDRESS OF BISHOP MYRE CONCLUDED.

The interval between the General Conference of 1820 and that of 1824 was spent by Mr. Soule in the pastoral work in the cities of New York and Baltimore—two years in each. A general superintendency was the field for such a man. He impressed himself all over it. Mounted on his favorite horse, he went forth seasons, self-sacrificing, and heroic. The range of his mind and heart was continental. His example and his speech inspired the preachers. Though a man of family, he followed the example of the far-traveling and ever-active Asbury, who had none. His horseback Episcopal tours through the States and Territories sometimes kept him from home for six and eight months, and embraced a sweep of thousands of miles. As to the estimation in which colleagues held him, it is enough to say that from 1828 to 1844, the writing of every quadrennial Episcopal address was devolved on him, and he did it.

By the General Conference of 1840 he was appointed fraternal messenger to British Methodism. No better selection could have been made for making an impression on Englishmen. The likeness between the American delegate and their iron Duke was striking, but it was the least of his qualifications. Besides all the other advantages, personal and moral, which attached to this mission, he bore out with him the news of the increase in American Methodism of over 70,000 members the past year. For the same year there had been a decrease in the Home British Church of 2,065 members.

The minutes of the British Conference furnish this record: "That the thanks of the Conference be presented to the Rev. Joshua Soule, D.D., one of the Bishops of the M. E. Church in the United States of America, for the sermon which he delivered in City Road Chapel, on Sunday evening, July 31st, and that he be earnestly requested to furnish a copy of it for publication in the Magazine."

On his way, he visited the Irish Conference, at Dublin, July 4, which body, in its address to their English brethren, said: "Among other incidents which have given a more than ordinary interest to our present Conference, we cannot omit mentioning the presence and ministerial communications of Bishop Soule, and his clerical companion, Rev. Thomas B. Sargent, from the M. E. Church in the United States of America. From them we have had lucid and powerful expositions of those holy doctrines, which, through the blessing of God, in the preaching of the Wesleys, first raised our societies into existence, and which, through the continuance of the same rich blessing, still nourish our people in newness of life. In the venerable Bishop we have discovered the same benignant, self-sacrificing, and undaunted spirit which animated the fathers of our Connection; and from his cheering statements, we have received ample evidence that Wesleyan Methodism, though varying in some adventitious circumstances, is the same in spirit, principle, and efficiency, in both communities."

The proceedings of the General Conference of 1844 resulted in the division of American Methodism into two distinct and independent ecclesiastical bodies. Bishop Soule did his utmost to prevent this division. In all the preliminary peace-measures, superinduced by the general desire for union, his counsels were sought, and his whole official influence was exerted to prevent disruption. History will award him the credit of zeal and devotion for the peaceable adjustment of the difficulty.

Subsequently to the General Conference of 1844, he sought, by all the appliances of his position and influence, to render the division a peaceable and fraternal one. Feeling its necessity, he yet strove to mitigate its evils. He refused to be or to be considered a sectional man—"to be immolated upon a Northern altar or upon a Southern altar." He stood upon the Discipline, the Constitution of the Church, and the rights of bishops, preachers, and members under it. Division accomplished, what should he do? He had been born and reared in the North. His family, and home, and kindred were there. In the South he had traveled and labored, and knew its people and their institutions. "Twice in my life," he was wont to say "have I been brought to a stand: twice have my faith and resolution been put to the test." But doing nothing rashly—taking every measure discreetly, and in the fear of God; exhibiting, at every step, that firmness and moderation which ever characterized him—he saw the Constitution with the South, and the right—and to the South he came.

I had left my little charge in old Williamsburg for a few days—left those few sheep in the wilderness—and gone up to Petersburg, in May, 1846, to see the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South. It was my first sight of the leading men of the Church, except that considerable proportion which the Virginia Conference held; and I, a young pastor, carried my note-book along. Like the Indian who, notching on a stick, meant very slyly to take the census of London, my note-book was soon filled up, and not half was written. I had left off sketching, till, feeble with asthma, walked in a man, to whom instantly all eyes paid deference. He was very erect; and when he sat down, seemed taller than a man of six feet might be. A glance at his face, fixed a noble image on my mind, which time cannot erase, and which does not grow older with years. It was Bishop Soule. And he formally gave in his adhesion to the M. E. Church, South, ending with these words: "In conclusion, I indulged the joyful assurance, that although separated from our Northern brethren by a distinct Conference jurisdiction, we shall never cease to treat them as 'brethren beloved,' and cultivate those principles and affections which constitute the essential unity of the Church of Christ."

He transferred his residence to the neighborhood of Nashville. How he has gone out and in before you, you know. He came late in life, but in time to teach you how to grow old gracefully, Christianly. "In labors more abundant" he was in his element when at work. After we had counted him superannuated, he made two trips of Episcopal visitation to California, organizing and cheering the Conference on the Pacific coast. To him, there was a perfecting grace in the Providence which restrained from labor. "The hardest work I ever had to do is to do nothing," he was wont to say, half-apolgetically, for the inactivity imposed by age and feebleness.

He knew how to abound and how to suffer want. Difficulty seemed to give relish for a duty. For one of his fine organism and sensibilities, he was singularly indifferent to material circumstances. You may have heard of that memorable speech to a Conference of itinerants, whom he was about sending forth to new and difficult fields: "Brethren, I have gone fulfilling my office these many years, through various scenes. I have traveled by pleasant conveyances along the great highways, and I have threaded my path through the wilderness alone. I have been in palaces, and slept on beds of down, and set at the groaning tables of luxury and wealth; and I have been in hovels, and slept on the ground on a bearskin, and shared his fare with the savage in his wigwag; and I declare to you I would not turn over my hand for the difference."

A mind and heart sustained at this elevation will go far to account for that esprit de corps he infused into his preachers. With what an impulse he sent them forth to do and to dare in Jesus' name! There was a touch of military genius in his nature which well suited his place in our system. He communicated ardor, he kindled a self-sacrificing zeal, by his bearing, his presence, his speech, his life. Said an eminent Georgian, an irreligious man, after hearing one of these characteristic addresses to a Conference held in Milledgeville: "It is no use resisting these men; they will take the world. There is not one of them that would not consider it an accommodation to be martyred."

As an executive there was, if I may so express it, an impersonality about him. When he decided a point of order, or sent us to our appointments, we felt that the Church had sent us, not he. Of the many thousands of appointments which he has made and the decisions rendered and official acts done, what man ever suspected that a spite, or a grudge, or a prejudice, or party spirit actuated our beloved Bishop! As a man he had his loves and his dislikes; but to the impartial officer, those were unknown. The law spake through him; the Church acted by him. He, the man, was not thrust upon you. And so reverence for law became easy, and obedience was not burdensome. As Samuel, the judge and prophet stood and challenged Israel, so might Joshua Soule, at the end of forty-three years of Episcopal prerogative, have addressed the assembled Methodism of America: "And now I am old and gray-headed, and I have walked before you from my childhood unto this day. Behold, here I am; witness against me before the Lord. Whose ox have I taken? or whose ass have I taken? or whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed?"

Were I to speak of him as a preacher, it would be more by tradition than personal knowledge; and there are traditions which could rest only upon real pulpit power. He had confidence in the preached word. To use his own language: "It is one of the cardinal principles of the kingdom of heaven; that the world is to be converted through preaching. Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." He looked for results at, under, and after the sermon, and thought the pulpit of the present day had fallen off from the ancient faith, in this matter. But success in turning individuals to righteousness is not to be taken as the measure of his usefulness. We must consider also how he directed and invigorated other agents, and the standard, and tone, and general elevation of Christian character imparted, under God, by his influence.

In the Christian, we behold the foundation of all his virtues laid. His regeneration by the Holy Spirit and his early consecration to God in heart and life, developed a Christian character that was the less noticeable in its single parts because so well rounded and complete as a whole. I believe he has finished his course, in the habitual exercise of virtues that would make some men, of a poorer stock, quite a reputation; and yet they would not be notified in any thing less than an elaborate summing up of his own. Let us thank God for having given him to the Church, and by his grace keep him faithful, and spare him so long.

As a man he would arrest attention and command respect in any crowd. Nature, by his frame and fibre, had fitted his body for great physical endurance, and the service of a massive intellect. Servility, in any human presence, was impossible to him; and equally, arrogance. He could be genial without levity, and dignified without austerity. It was more natural for him to say Sir, than Brother. He was the life of company by his conversation, which was seasoned with salt. So firmly did his mind grasp any topic, even the smallest, he held your attention to it. But in his most unobtrusive moods, he could not be caught off his guard. Perhaps his manner ran into a fault here, from long habitudes of office, that he delivered his opinion upon any and every subject as though he were in the "chair," and expected his words to be taken down.

And are not our words taken down—all of them? Who is careful, in this respect, as he ought to be, considering what the Master says of idle words, and how they enter into our final judgment?

He lived and died poor, but made many rich. He was a lover of good men, of all names and sects. Of ultraism, of any sort, he was incapable. The Wesleyan motto, "To spread Scriptural holiness over these lands," sounded peculiarly well from his lips, and suited the breadth of his life-labor.

But he is gone! Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth. Who is left that can lift the spear or bend the bow which he has laid down?

God's work had appeared unto his servant. He saw the Methodists of America, who were but sixty thousand when his ministry began, now numbering two millions. He had borne the burden and heat of the day, while two generations had passed from the stage. His cotemporary were gone. And of loved ones, there were more on that side the flood than on this. Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart.

In company with the pastor of this church, I called on him last month, soon after he removed his residence to the city. He received us in his usual bland and courtly and affectionate way. Our inquiries after his health were answered by quoting, in his finest style, from Ecclesiastes: "The keepers of the house do tremble, and the strong men bow themselves, and the grinders cease because they are few, and those that look out of the windows are darkened; then, touching his trembling hand to his head, 'You see, brethren, the almond-tree flourishes.' On our leaving and prayer being proposed, we intimated that he should remain seated: 'No, let me get to my knees'—and, one on each side, we helped him down and up.

He refused to take a poetic or romantic view of death. It was a reality; not an end, but a change of the mode of existence. He had been looking for it; it had come; he was ready.

On Tuesday afternoon he sunk fast. Often he asked what time it was, and reading the hour from the face of the old silver watch that hung at the head of his bed, and which he had worn so long it seemed a part of him, we reported it. "Do you feel any pain?" "None at all," until about the turn of night, when he answered, "Not much."

Say what we will about death, it is a shadow, a cloud, a dark valley. It is a time of strangling, and struggling, and cold obstructions. Perhaps we put too much emphasis on the article of it, as an occasion of spiritual manifestation. The Scriptures describe the death of Jacob, and David, and Paul, as the sequel of a religious life, and on their lives we rest our comfortable hope. Stephen's case, the first martyr, is an exception. To our venerable father, no ecstatic raptures were given, but tranquility. There were no fears, no gloomy uncertainties, no trepidations. He knew in whom he had believed. He had committed the keeping of soul and body to One who is faithful, and there he rested.

A little before midnight—"Bishop, you have preached the gospel to others—now is all clear before you?" Softly he answered, "Yes, yes." Do you understand me, Bishop, "I do, sir."

About one o'clock he seemed to be passing under the cloud and disappearing; I said, "Is all right, still?" Then for the last time did he throw that peculiar emphasis upon his words, "All right, sir; all right."

At intervals we gave him water, which he swallowed with an appearance of thirst. Soon after drinking it, about 2 o'clock, when his voice, though feeble, was distinct, seeing him cross his hands on his breast, I asked, "Are you praying?" He replied, "Not now," and never spoke more.

I was surprised at these words; they were not what I expected, for I knew he understood me and meant what he said. But as I looked at him lying there, and thought on the words "not now," they began to appear right, very right. His work was done: the night had come when no man can work. He was quiescent. The servant who has loitered away the day, begins to be very busy when the shadows lengthen. There is such a thing as having nothing to do but to die. Woe to the man who has his praying to do and his dying at the same time! He that believeth shall not make haste. Not praying now: that was done with, and the time for praising would soon set in. Like a ship, brave and staunch, that has weathered the storms and buffeted the waves; the voyage is ended; and as it nears the land, the busy wheels cease their revolutions, and under the headway and momentum previously acquired, it glides into the harbor.

The change came. The family were called in and stood around, as the silver cord was loosed, without a struggle, or groan, or the appearance of any pain. He had put off this tabernacle. Absent from the body—present with the Lord! "My father! my father! the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof."

RITUALISM.

Our readers may have some conception of the twistings, bendings, backings, fillings, crossings, dressings, and undressing, toning, and intoning, by which it is contemplated to bridge the way from the Episcopal to the Catholic Church, by the following description of a Forty-Seventh street church service in New York. We extract it from the Presbyterian Index:

Morning prayers commenced at 10 o'clock, the two Rectors and twenty persons being present. The prayer-book service and lessons were read. Save that the service was read rapidly, and without music, and the sign of the cross was made at the close, there was nothing unusual in it. The Rectors went out as the 10½ church bells commenced ringing, the house was soon crowded—the services re-commenced. An acolyte (a boy in cassock) walked in with down-cast eyes, bowed low before the altar, opened the iron gates, stepped back, bowed low again, and without raising the eyes, he passed out with his hands held before him, the three last fingers closed and second joints meeting, the index fingers pointed, points touching and the thumbs crossed, (all the priests, singers and acolytes always walked in this manner, with down cast eyes. I will not, therefore, repeat this.) Next came a larger boy with cassock, bowing low before the altar, laying a prayer book upon it, and bowing low and going out. Back came number one as before, laying something upon the steps of the altar. Back comes number two, as before, and did the same on the other side of the steps—back came number one, now with surplice over his cassock, placed the bread upon the altar, laying over it a purple cloth, emblazoned with Maltese cross and trimmed with heavy silver fringe. Number two, with surplice and cassock, brought in wine and placed it on the credence table. Number one brought in goblets and placed them on the credence table. Number two returned, bringing the sermon, which he placed upon the pulpit, (you will understand, each boy bowed low before the altar, every time he came in and went out, and only one boy was in the church at a time.) Then the organist, in surplice, took his position within the chancel music was heard from without, and from a side door, below the chancel, came a boy in cassock and surplice, bearing a gilded cross about six feet high; eight boys in surplice followed; then six youths in cassock and short surplice, then the Rev. Mr. Morrill, with cassock and surplice—a purple band, crossing under the left arm, falling low at the side, with a Maltese cross in each corner and a silver fringe across the ends, then Rev. Mr. Noise, with like band falling in front—chanting, they passed up the steps, the singers filed off to their sedilia, the boy planted the crucifix, and facing the altar, all bowed low at the same moment, (outside the chancel a semi-circle of the faithful, kneeling when the august pageant entered, and now bowed low and crossed themselves.) Rev. Mr. Noise (facing altar) intoned the litany, the boys chanting the responses. At the close was the benediction, all crossing themselves. Then Rev. Mr. Morrill (for the first time facing the audience,) gave out "Selection 23d from the Psalter." Then the two priests and two acolytes passed out. One acolyte came in, bowed low before the altar, lighted eight candles, stepped back, bowed low, and went out. Then Rev. Mr. Noise came in, having put his purple band on his wrist, and over his shoulders the cape. (It is a purple cape, cut shawl pattern, trimmed with white around the edge and over the shoulders, and up the back—where the trimming crossed was a small Maltese cross.) Mr. Morrill followed; then the two acolytes. Mr. Noise came to the gate of the inner chancel, stopped—bowed low before the altar—stepped up one step—stopped—bowed low—another step the motions same—the third, crossed himself, knelt, crossed his arms and bowed his head upon the edge of the altar.

Rev. Mr. Morrill followed in the same manner, stopping and kneeling on second step at Mr. Noise's right. The acolytes did the same, but knelt on the floor. In the meantime the 23rd psalm had been chanted. Then commenced the ante-communion service, commands intoned, responses chanted—then Nicene creed, bowing at name of Jesus, crossing at resurrection of body, then Mr. Noise, facing the audience, intoned the benediction, making a huge cross in the air.

The sermon ended, the services, "so-called," re-commenced by the lighting of the other eight candles; then, with bowings and crossings, the alms were laid on the altar; then the boys brought the cup and wine from the credence table, and they were laid on the altar; then a bowl and napkin, and the celebrant washed his hands; then the communion service was resumed, the celebrant, when directed to take the bread in his hand, elevated the host above the head, also the wine. Then all prostrated themselves—they had knelt before; now they prostrated themselves. All had bowed to the altar before; now they dropped on one knee. Why the change? Was not the Real Presence expressed by the appearance of increased devotion? If not, what was? The celebrant partook of each, then gave to the priest, then to the acolytes—each crossing himself, each prostrating himself. Then Mr. Noise, holding the paten even with the eyes, stepped down and stood with the right side to the altar. Rev. Mr. Morrill stood opposite, holding the wine with both hands, even with the eyes. When the communicants had surrounded the chancel, they stepped down. Mr. Noise, with each morsel of bread, made the sign of the cross upon each communicant, and then placed it in the centre of the unglazed palm. Rev. Mr. Morrill followed, holding the wine to the lips so no unhallowed hands could touch that goblet; then resumed their positions, holding the host and wine as before, until the chancel filled again, and again—the organ playing throughout all the service. All having communed, the Lord's Prayer was chanted; then Mr. Noise faced the audience, intoned the benediction, with a huge cross in the air. Then the celebrant proceeded to consume all the bread and wine. The Acolytes brought two small silver pitchers, and, as he held the cup, poured water (I think) into the cup, rinsed it three times around, and, crossing himself, drank it. Then the boys placed the pitchers and goblet upon the credence table; then, "Glory be to the Father;" another cross, and the crucifix was raised, and all chanting, passed out as they had come in. As the last one disappeared, all the faithful crossed themselves, and rose from their knees.

And so ended my first view of St. Albans, the services having lasted from ten to one.

Destitution of the South.

An influential New York paper before it says:

"While the granaries of the West are bursting with food, and the people of all the Northern States are enjoying wonted prosperity, the cry of starvation begins to rise in the South. It is not alone the cotton crop that has failed, but the stock of cereals falls far below the promise of three months ago. The prospects in the cotton States are as gloomy as the bitterest enemy of the South could desire. The cotton crop, as we predicted six months ago, will barely reach a million and a half bales, and a considerable part of it is said to be mortgaged to Northern capitalists who advanced money to the planters in the Spring. Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee and Kentucky have raised fair crops of cereals, but not more than enough for their own population. The other States have raised but little food, and less the population get assistance from some quarter, they must suffer the most painful privations. The next season's crop is matured, but former times the South had a wealthy class, to assist its poor in time of need, but there is no resident wealthy class there now. The entire mass of the Southern people have been reduced to a condition of absolute necessity. It is as much as any planter can do to provide support for those depending on him, and some will be pushed hard to even this. A widespread apprehension of actual famine prevails in some of the cotton States, and neither the State authorities nor better class of planters are able to provide much alleviation for suffering."

LETTER FROM DR. PLUMER.

BUT WHAT SHALL BE DONE?—This is a great inquiry. It would take hours to speak to it fully. I drop a few hints.

1. We ought to do all the good we can to advance among us interests of a sound education. One great preparation for the spread of the gospel, in the century was the wide-spread intelligence of the people. True knowledge was sadly perverted; but people generally knew enough to comprehend the meaning of the apocryphal and their conditors. Education cannot be carried too far; a people cannot be too enlightened.

2. We must encourage all youth of fit character and due qualifications earnestly to inquire whether they are not called by God to prepare for preaching the gospel; and, if they are persons of their call, we must see that they are not hindered for want of funds to secure a proper training. It is still God's plan to save men from the foolishness of preaching. We can we too solemnly hear and ponder the words of our Lord in Matthew 23: 37, 38: "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few. Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth laborers into his harvest." In raising up a faithful ministry, God greatly honored pious women in ancient and modern times. The names of Hannah, of Eunice, of Lois, Monica, of the mothers of David, Balaam, and a great many such men.

3. Let grammar schools be established or revived wherever practicable, either under the inspection of learned and godly ministers. Of twenty lads, read the first four books in Latin, it is probable that twelve will mate at some respectable college. Of these twelve it is likely six become preachers of the gospel, provided the school is under control of such men as I have spoken of. Oh that we had fifty such schools as Wadwell, Alexander, others formerly established in South Carolina.

4. Perhaps we, who pine ought to preach more than we do. If the population is sparse and the congregations small, let us not be discouraged. Many a soul has received saving impressions of divine truth in a congregation where there were not twenty persons present. Let us not forget that the law of our ministry is pressed in few words—"In season and out of season." For a time my mind has dwelt much on Acts vi: 4. The apostles felt at liberty to devolve the distribution of alms on other fit persons. Nor do they seem to have been important that they, rather than others, should administer the elements. Indeed, Paul thanks that in a given church he had baptized only a few. But no one dared to pretermitt constant preaching: "We will give ourselves continually to prayer and the ministry of the word."

5. We must do all we can to revive family religion, including instruction and daily devotion among our people. For this wit of man has never provided a tolerable substitute. If God only honored and worshipped in our families, we should soon see wondrous change for the better.

6. We should put a high value on the value of pure, powerful and scriptural revivals of religion, and use all right means to promote them. We should all cry to the Lord: "Wilt thou not revive again, that thy people may rejoice in thee?" Saints and sinners, and all people, need a pouring out of God's Spirit to glorify our hearts. "Lord revive us."

Very fraternally yours,
Wm. S. Plumer

A TALK WITH THE PRESIDENT.

MR. JOHNSON ON THE TENDENCY TO REPUTATE OUR NATIONAL DEBT.

WASHINGTON, March 6, 1867.

And now, apart from the directly political, continued the President, what is the main issue looming up in the immediate future? What is the clearly foreshadowed to be the Aaron's rod which must swallow up all minor questions? It is the great financial issue, the issue of the national debt; whether it shall be paid or repudiated? This issue has fibres extending into the pocket of every citizen, for whoever a man has a dollar, or can earn a dollar, the government is now compelled to go for its portion of the substance, and with the vast machinery under its control, the money is fetched.

There were four million of slaves in the Southern States before the rebellion, representing a capital of three, or possibly four billions of dollars; but let us call it three billions, or three thousand millions, as you may please. These slaves represented that amount of property, men put their savings into purchasing or raising them, and they represented as property whatever was the surplus profit of their labor, after due allowance for food, clothing, medicine, and interest on the capital invested.

On this property, in slaves gradually grew up that slave-oligarchy or aristocracy, against which the leaders of the anti-slavery party so successfully thundered during the twelve years preceding the rebellion; and after the first mad plunge into rebellion the fate of aristocracy was sealed. It was now a thing of the past. With its virtues—for it had virtues, courage, and hospitality eminently—and with its crimes of pride and lawless revolution, it has entered into history, and is a thing of the past.

But what do we now find? The aristocracy based on three thousand millions of property in slaves south of Mason and Dixon's line has disappeared; but an aristocracy, based on over two thousand five hundred millions of national securities, has arisen in the Northern States; to assume that political control which the consolidation of great financial with political interests formerly gave to the slave-oligarchy of the rebel States. The aristocracy based on negro property disappears at the Southern end of the line, but only to reappear in an oligarchy of bonds and national securities in the States which suppressed the rebellion.

We have all read history, and it is not certain that of all aristocracies that of mere wealth is the most odious, rapacious and tyrannical? It goes for the last dollar the poor and helpless have got; and with such a vast machine as this Government in its control that dollar will be fetched. It is an aristocracy that can see in the people only a prey for extortion.

It has no political or military relations with them, such as the old feudal system created between liege lord and vassal; it has no intimate social and domestic ties, and no such strong bond of self-interest with the people as existed of necessity between the extinct slaveholders of our country and their slaves. To an aristocracy existing on the annual interest of our national debt, the people are only of value in proportion to their docility and power of patiently bleeding golden blood under the tax gatherer's thumb-screw.

To the people the national debt is a thing of debt, to be paid; but to the aristocracy of bonds and national securities, it is a property of more than two thousand five hundred millions, from which a revenue of one hundred and eighty millions a year is to be received into their pockets. So we now find that an aristocracy of the South, based on negroes—who were a productive class—has disappeared; and their place, in political control of the country is assumed by an aristocracy based on nearly three thousand millions of national debt a thing which is not producing anything, but which goes on steadily every year, and must go on for all time until the debt is paid, absorbing and taxing at the rate of six or seven per cent. a year for every hundred dollar bond that is represented in its aggregation.

Now, I am not speaking of this to do anything but depreciate the fearful issue which the mediocrity of partisan hatred and the blindness of our new national debt aristocracy to their own true interests is fast forcing upon the country. But it is not clear that the people, who have to pay one hundred and eighty millions of dollars a year to this consolidated—mobbed oligarchy, must, sooner or later, commence asking each other, "how much was actually loaned to our government during the civil war by these bondholders, who now claim that we owe them nearly three thousand millions of dollars?" You know what the popular answer must be—I do not say the right answer: "Less than half the amount they claim, for gold ranged at an average of one hundred premium while this debt was being incurred."

Just think of the annual tax of one hundred and eighty millions for payment of interest on our national debt! This government we have, with its enormous machinery, is a pretty hefty business in itself, costing more per capita to the people than the government of England, which we always heretofore regarded as the most tax-devouring on earth.

But over and beyond the expenses of this government proper, as it should stand in the scale of peace at about sixty millions a year, we have, in the one hundred and eighty millions of interest paid yearly on our national debt, enough to support three such governments as this, with all their vast machinery and disbursements! We have not only, under the present system, one government for the people to support, but over and beyond this, we have to raise by taxation, from the people, sufficient to support three similar establishments every year.

All property is based upon and can only be sustained by law; and it is for a return to law, and the guide of fixed constitutional principles that my whole course has been contending. But so short sighted is this aristocracy of bonds and paper currency—this Plutocracy of the national debt—that my efforts in behalf of their true interests (which are certainly involved in the maintenance of law and the constitution) have been everywhere encountered, and almost everywhere overwhelmed by the preponderant influence which they have acquired from the natural force of capital and the agency of our national banks.

And what has been the course of that Congress which has just ended, and which this blind aristocracy of national debt sustained in overriding my efforts for a return to sound principles of internal government?

Look at the bill giving from four hundred eighty to six hundred millions of dollars—nominally for back bounty, or as an equalization of bounties to the soldiers, but really, as all intelligent men must be aware, to be parcelled out as a prey among the bounty sharks and claim agents, who are the most reckless and clamorous adherents of the dominant majority in Congress. Then look at appropriations amounting to another hundred millions for internal improvements, which should properly be left to the laws governing private industry and the progress of our national development. Look also at the increase of all salaries with a prodigious hand; this virtuous Congress first setting an example against retrenchment by voting to themselves an increase of salaries. Everywhere, an ever increasing ratio, the motto seems to be: "Always spend and never spare."

A fresh issue from the paper-mill over yonder (slightly pointing his pencil to the treasury department) being the panacea prescribed for every evil of our present situation. Every effort to increase our annual taxation is resisted, for increased taxes might help to awaken the people from their false dream of prosperity under the sway of revolutionary and radical ideas; but no addition to the national debt can be proposed, no further inflation of our inflated currency, which the preponderating votes of the Western States will not be certain to favor. The war of finance is the next war we have to fight; and every blow struck against my efforts to uphold a strict construction of the laws and the Constitution is, in reality, a blow in favor of repudiating the national debt. The manufacturers and men of capital in the Eastern States and the States along the Atlantic seaboard—a mere strip or fringe on the broad mantle of our country, if you will examine the map—these are in favor of high protective, and, in fact, prohibitory tariffs; and also favor a contraction of the currency. But against both measures the interests and votes of the great producing and non-manufacturing States of the West stand irrevocably arrayed, and a glance at the map and the census statistics of the last twenty years will tell every one who is open to conviction how that war must end.

The history of the world gives no example of a war debt that has ever been paid; but we have an exceptional country, and present an exceptional case. Our debt might easily be paid, provided the brakes against excessive expenditures could be turned on quickly enough—but now is the appointed time, and now or never the work must be commenced. If that debt is ever to be paid, we need economy in every branch of the public service—the reduction, not an increase of salaries to congressmen and other officials; the systematic reduction of our national debt; and not its increase by such monstrous bills as this last demagogic measure for the pretended equalization of bounties. The Congress, forsooth, is so patriotic, so loyal, that it "can refuse our gallant soldiers nothing," but you must have seen how promptly it rejected the names of nearly every gallant veteran sent in by me for confirmation to any civil office—a majority of our extremely "loyal Senators" using their guillotine, without remorse, in nearly every instance.

And whether is all this drifting? To intelligent men there can be but one answer: We are drifting toward repudiation, and the moneyed aristocracy of the national debt—the very men whose interests are most jeopardized—are so blind that they are practically helping to accelerate, not check our course in this downward direction. We need the industry and enormous possible products of the lately revolted States to help us in bearing our heavy burden. We need confidence and calm—we need internal harmony; and above all, we need a return to the unquestioned supremacy of the civil laws and constitutional restraints if our debt is not to be repudiated within the next half score of years.

Financial prosperity was secured up to within a recent period; but already the delicate fabric of public credit—a house of cards at best—begins to totter under the concussion of the various revolutionary ideas which have been recently exploited on the floors of Congress. Who now talks of the Constitution with respect? Who is not now made a laughing-stock in the papers and speeches of the violent revolutionary party, if he shall be so hardy as to claim that, being again at peace, the sway of civil over military law should be immediately resumed, if we desire to maintain our liberties? "The Constitution is played out," we hear on every hand, and every effort to advocate the just ascendancy of the civil law only furnishes fresh food for ridicule.

No party as yet, and possibly no party for some years will openly hoist the banner of repudiation. But a majority of those who shaped the legislation of the last Congress must know, unless they deceive themselves, or are too ignorant to appreciate their own acts, that we are drifting in that direction, and that it is by their votes we have been swung out into the downward stream. Doubtless some of them would either be, or affect to feel, horrified if to-day branded as repudiators, just as, in the infancy of the free soil agitation, it was considered a bitter slander if the "freesoiler" should be styled an "abolitionist."

There are steps in everything, and the term of reproach to-day will be worn as a feather in the cap some years from now, unless the true conservative wisdom of the country can be awakened, and, rapidly, from its asphyxiating dream that our "national debt is a national blessing."

And look at the effect of the reconstruction bill just passed over my unavailing veto. I mean its peculiar effect as a step in the direction of repudiation, and not its general effect as a high handed measure of Congressional usurpation, striking out of existence so many States, and establishing a military despotism over more than one-third of our geographical Union. This bill suddenly adds four millions of ignorant and penniless negroes to the voting force of the country—an accession of just so much strength to the party whose interest it is, and must increasingly become, to favor repudiation as a policy. To secure the public creditor, our efforts should be—if that were possible—to restrict rather than to extend the right of suffrage; for money rapidly aggregates in a few hands; and whenever the men who have an interest in seeing that our national debt is paid shall have become out of all proportion few, compared with those who have an interest in its repudiation, the votes of the many will carry it, and the debt of three thousand millions will be struck out of existence by ballots just as rapidly and utterly as the similar amount invested in Southern negroes has been abolished during the recent war under showers of bullets. At least, this is possible.

That we are to have a great financial crash this year I hold to be inevitable—though deprecating it, and having used every effort for its avoidance. To say that it can be stayed off by any legislation, if the violated laws of trade and public economy call for it, is to assert that water can be made to run up hill, or shall cease to seek its own level under the compulsion of a congressional enactment. Perhaps for so violent a disease, this violent cure may be the only remedy. It is like a man sustaining his strength on brandy; so long as he can increase the dose daily, he may get along in high good humor, just as we have been prospering on an irredeemable paper currency and fresh issue of public securities.

But, sooner or later, the day will come in which brandy no longer can stimulate, nor can irredeemable promises to pay pass current as a circulating medium forever. To the man will come a severe fit of sickness, teaching him that the laws of temperance can only be violated under fearful penalties; and to the nation will come a financial crash, teaching it that paper is only a representative of value, not value itself; and that the only true securities for our public credit must be looked for in a system of rigidly exacted obedience to all constitutional restraints, and a thorough system of economy in all branches of the public service.

For the slights and indignities—the unconstitutional curtailments and dishonors which the recent Congress has attempted to cast upon me for my unalterable devotion to my constitutional oath, and to the best interests of the whole country, according to my best judgment and experience, I am only sorry as regards the indignities sought to be imposed on my high office, but unmoved as regards myself.

Conscious of only having executed my duty—conscious of being denounced for "usurpation," only because refusing to accept unconstitutional powers and patronage—and satisfied that the day of wiser thought and a sounder estimate cannot now be far distant—I look with perfect confidence for my vindication to the justice of that future which I am convinced cannot long be delayed. Unless all the senses are deceptive, unless all truth be a lie, unless God has ceased to live, I tell you that the folly and fraud now dominating the councils of this distracted country in Congress cannot endure forever.

The President uttered this last sentence with great earnestness and fire, his previous remarks having been delivered in the calm, grave, earnest monotone which is his habitual form of expression.

It is, perhaps, but right to add that the foregoing is a report from memory of remarks made by Mr. Johnson in an extended conversation yesterday afternoon, and that the original did not take the form of a set speech, here unavoidably given to it. It should also be added that a few points embraced in the report, and attributed exclusively to the President, may have been, more or less, suggested by interjectional remarks of the person to whom he was speaking; but nothing has been here set down to which the full assent of Mr. Johnson was not given—always provided, of course, that his listener understood him, and remembers correctly.

FARM AND GARDEN.

EARTH CORN.—As the corn crop of the past season was so great a failure, it is expedient to get a new crop as soon as possible. The gourd seed variety, though the most valuable for this climate, is very late, requiring six months before it is ready for the mill; while some of the smaller varieties, as the King Phillips, may be ready for use in four months, and in very favorable seasons in ninety days. The past season, some King Phillips' corn was planted as an experiment by three different persons, April 1. On the 13th of July this corn was dry enough to grind, while the large varieties were only in silk. This variety can be planted much closer, and thus makes as great a yield as the large variety. As it ripens before the July or August droughts, we may hope to have a crop when the gourd seed is a failure. While we would not abandon the large varieties for the main crop, would it not be well for each farmer to try a few acres of some small variety?

The corn crop is too important to be abandoned, and we must inquire what are the causes of failure of late years, for the average fall of rain is not less now than formerly. This, we think, can be shown to be the absence of vegetable matter (humus) in the soil.

By observation it has been found that in contiguous fields of corn, cultivated alike, the results during a drought are very different; e. g.: "Wishing to make a crop of seventy bushels to the acre, I manured heavily four acres. In them was a fence row that had grown up with briars. It was fall of mould and new ground. About half an acre was half worn out; one quarter of an acre had been made very rich with stable manure put on ten years previous. The other portions were very much worn, but I manured nearly all of the field beautifully, with unfertilized manure, leaving a portion, however, unmanured. It was cultivated twelve inches deep—in some places turning up the clay, which had but little fertility and no mould. Soon after the seed came in, a drought set in, and the corn ceased to grow. It began to be affected by the drought in the following order: 1. The poor unmanured portion; 2. The recently manured; 3. The old manured; 4. The half worn unmanured; 5. The fence row, also unmanured. The last appeared to be little affected by the drought. When the rain set in, the corn commenced to grow in the reverse order to the above. A second and more severe drought set in, during which the corn tasseled. On No. 1 the stalks were very small; No. 2, much bigger; No. 3, very good; No. 4, not so good as No. 3, but most of the tassels uninjured; No. 5, stalks good and no tassels destroyed. No corn was made in Nos. 1, 2 and 3; on 4, a poor crop; on 5 the crop was good."

From this experiment, as from repeated observation, we draw our conclusion that the remote cause of failure in this case was absence of vegetable mold, almost as much as the want of moisture. The corn crop is one of clean culture, and therefore requires repeated plowings during Summer, thus constantly exposing a new surface to the sun, by which much mold is decomposed into its elements, and thus wasted. Mold is one form of carbon. When this is consumed, the land is exhausted. The inorganic elements of grain may be plentiful in the soil, yet partial barrenness may be the consequence, for want of the organic, to form the gluten, starch, sugar, oil, etc., of the grain. The first indication of the wearing out of a soil is its liability to bake and its inability to withstand drought.

We frequently here it said the climate is changing, and the droughts are greater. The fact is, our old lands will not produce corn as they used to do, while the new lands do well, and stand the heat of Summer. All new soils are full of mold, in a state of partial decay. By repeated cultivation and exposure to the sun, much of it is decomposed and formed into carbonic acid gas, a part of which is consumed by the plant, and much wasted in the air. It is not possible to estimate how much the crop consumes, but it is thought that more damage is caused by the repeated cultivation, than by the removal of the crop, stalks and grain. The productive action of mold is three-fold its change by decay into gas, its power of absorbing gas from the air, and by holding moisture. Mold sustains vegetation, for it is the remains of a previous living vegetation.

All earths do not thus possess this power of absorption. Clays and sands do not. They may be cultivated and watered by the most genial of seasons, but no profitable produce can be yielded, until mold in some form is applied.

Mold is also valuable as a non-conductor of heat, thus keeping the roots cool, while the plant has the advantage of the light and heat of the sun.

This might lead to the inquiry, from whence do plants draw moisture, other than from rain, but time forbids. In our next we will inquire: How may mold be best preserved in the soil, and how restored when exhausted?

The preceding article is a suggestive one. If our planters will try a few acres of corn of the early varieties, on really good ground, for Summer use, we have no doubt they will be satisfied with the result. It is not worth while to go largely into raising this sort of corn, for the weevil is much more troublesome in it than in the kinds that ripen later; but, in connection with a good crop of Spring oats, it will supply us with bread and keep the teams in good condition until the main crop is ready.

We have not the slightest doubt that the droughts from which we suffer so much of late years, are so severely felt because we have exhausted the vegetable matter in the soil. And it is a matter of vital importance to the Southern farmer to know how this can be restored or preserved. We know our correspondent can give us a sensible and practical article on this topic, and we look for it with much interest. [Editor Southern Cultivator.]

AUCTION OF LADIES.—An auction of unmarried ladies used to take place annually in Babylon. "In every district," says the historian, "they assembled on a certain day of the year all the modest maidens of a marriageable age. The most beautiful was first put up, and the man who bid the highest or largest sum of money gained possession of her. The second in personal appearance followed, and the bidders gratified themselves with handsome wives according to the depth of their purses. But, alas! it seems there were in Babylon some ladies for whom no money was likely to be offered, yet these also were disposed of, so prudent were the Babylonians. When all the beautiful were sold, the crier ordered the most deformed to stand up, and after he had demanded who would marry her with a small sum, she was at length adjudicated to the man who would be satisfied with the least; in this manner the money arising from the sale of the handsome served as a portion to those who were of disagreeable looks or had any other imperfection. This custom prevailed three hundred years before Christ.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

PRESERVATION OF BUTTER IN FRANCE. On this subject the Journal of the Society of Art says: One part of sugar, one part of nitre, and two parts of salt, reduced to a very fine powder, constitute a good mixture for the preservation of butter. Sixty grammes, or rather more than two ounces of this mixture, is sufficient for a kilogramme, or about two pounds and a quarter of fresh butter which thus prepared remains very good a fortnight afterward; its taste is very soft and agreeable, and will last for years. There is also another mode of preserving, viz: the butter is melted and purified with honey, sixty grammes of which is used for each kilogramme, the two substances being mixed with care. An agreeable flavor is obtained, and it will remain good a long time.

COAL TAR ON RATS.—A correspondent of the American Agriculturist says that rats dislike coal tar very much; and that he is in the habit of daubing it about their holes and runs with good results. Taking the hint from the suggestion to dip rats in red paint, he proposes to dip some infusorial tar and let them go. Mr. Gilbert J. Green says: "Coal tar, mixed with sand to the consistency of thick mortar, is an effectual stopper to rat holes. The process is not patented, and a sure cure is warranted."

CAOUTCHOUC AND GUTTA PERCHA CEMENTS.—India rubber, at about 400 deg. F., is converted into a glutinous mass. By the addition of fresh slacked lime to twice its weight of gum elastic, or rubber in this state, a non-drying cement of great tenacity is formed, and is used in fastening together plates of glass so as to exclude the air, but which may easily be separated. A drying cement is made by mixing equal weights of such gum, lime, and minium (red lead). Gutta percha dissolved by chloroform produced a cement now used for holding together pieces of leather. The mixture is spread on the pieces to be joined and allowed to dry, after which they are warmed and pressed together. This cement, although water-proof, will not resist any great strain, but will be found serviceable in covering many small defects; for instance, those arising from wearing high-heeled boots, the hiding of which was the origin of now fashionable toe pieces. Gutta percha soles can thus be attached to new boots, which may last for a winter. There are doubtless many other uses to which the gum cements described may be applied with advantage.

VARNISH FOR SHOES.—It is a bad plan to grease the upper leather of shoes for the purpose of keeping them soft; it rots the leather and admits dampness more readily. It is better to make a varnish thus: Put half a pound of gum shellac, broken up in small pieces, in a quart bottle or jug, cover it with alcohol, cork it tight and put it on a shelf or a warm place; shake it well several times a day, then add a piece of gum camphor as large as a hen's egg; shake it well, and in a few hours shake it again and add one ounce of lamp black, if the alcohol is good, it will be dissolved in three days; then shake and use. If it gets too thick, add alcohol—pour out two or three teaspoonfuls in a saucer, and apply it with a small paint brush. If the materials were all good, it will dry in about five minutes, and will be removed only by wearing it off, giving a gloss almost equal to patent leather.

The advantage of this preparation above others is, that it does not strike into the leather and make it hard, but remains on the surface, and yet excludes the water almost perfectly. This same preparation is admirable for harness, and does not soil when touched, as lamp black mixtures do.

CHLOROFORM.—It is said that chloroform is an excellent article for the removal of stains of paint from clothes, etc. Portions of dry white paint which successfully resisted the action of ether benzole and bisulphide of carbon, are at once dissolved by chloroform.

EXCELLENT SOFT SOAP.—Take 16 quarts of lye of sufficient strength to float an egg; 8 pounds of clean grease; 14 pounds of rosin; put the whole into a five-pail kettle and boil it. At first it is apt to rise, in which case add a little strong lye, and so continue to do until the materials are incorporated. Then remove it from the fire, and add, by degrees weak lye, stirring it at every addition until the kettle is full.

The Memphis Appeal says that old Brownlow was nominated for chaplain of the Fortieth Congress, but did not receive a single vote.

183 persons have been burned to death during the past year, and about 6,000,000 of dollars worth of property destroyed by the explosion of kerosene lamps, nearly every case due to carelessness.

TO ADVERTISERS.

This paper has for many years been well known in this community as the very best advertising medium by which the business men of the city could bring their merchandise, trades, professions, and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood when it is remembered that the four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States in the Rio Grand, East Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all, more or less active agents for the paper; and when it is also remembered that our paper circulates among a large class of people who seldom see any other New Orleans paper.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order. We have reason to believe that of all the monies forwarded to us by mail but a very small amount has failed to reach us; whenever the letters have been registered.

RETRIBUTION.

In our opinion the most expensive work ever done in the Sugar-lands of Louisiana was that which was done on a Sabbath. To be sure the planter was required, by law, to pay for it at a rate double the price of ordinary day's labor. Yet this he often escaped, for there was no one to prosecute the claims of the laborer. The amount of work that has been done during the sugar-rolling seasons, and all other seasons, taking a period of say the last forty years, on Sabbath days, would, if added together, make about five years and eight months. The law of rest pervades sea and earth, man and beast. This period of rest became due to the broad surface of this Delta, by the Law of the Sabbath; "In it thou shalt do no work." The Father of all good is a patient creditor, but he ultimately exacts payment to the "utmost farthing." Even the discharge of a repenting sinner can be only by the shedding of blood. The mere passage of time does not affect Him who is "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever." And now His great law of the Sabbath at last finds satisfaction in hundreds of abandoned or uncultivated plantations and fields. The law of retribution has also overtaken thousands of men who have used their incomes as if there were no tax placed upon them by Him who gives seed to the sower and bread to the eater. The tenth which was not theirs, because expressly withheld; they have used upon themselves; and the poor, God's orphan, have not received that support which had been provided for them by the Father of Mercies. There were but few men who did not thus use their Master's goods. At length the time for adjusting things came suddenly upon us. Thousands of these "unfaithful stewards" were discharged. Their goods disappeared, and their consideration; they no longer have the control of that wealth which was used so selfishly. Fortunate indeed if the Great Creditor will here let the matter stop, and consider that these unfaithful ones have been sufficiently punished in the loss of their forfeited gains.

Will this stupendous lesson impress the myriads of our people, that no man can with impunity withhold from God a tenth of his income? That He has at last presented the bill and collected arrears—two thousand millions—He who can afford to wait, with whom a thousand years is as one day. It is enough to awaken us from the habitual conceit, that all we have is our own. But men are to be seen even now, who do but repeat their ancient folly. They "withhold more than is meet," vainly hoping thereby to enrich themselves. They are still unwilling to give to either the poor or the Lord. Though lamenting that they had not dealt charitably while it was in their power to give largely, yet they are again closing their hands with the grip of a drowning miser. Churches are shut up, and ministers are driven off by the parsimony of their flocks, or teach school for the privilege of preaching. Men who have devoted their strength, their lives, to the service of the sanctuary, must now apprentice themselves to "tent-making," or starve.

In some places real poverty, yea grim, want, has visited people as well as Pastor. Thank God, that in such cases there are Holy men, who uncomplainingly share in the common distress, and still minister to the multitude the bread of life. The faithfulness and general intelligence of these men have secured sympathy and substantial relief for the people they serve. Though poor they have "made many rich." The efforts of our ministers have been heard by godly people in the middle States, and Missouri, and thousands of bushels of corn, and pounds of bacon are now on the way to save the Southern farmer from starvation, and to prove that "Godliness is profitable unto all things." As with the besieged city, so with these starving sections—"Now there was found in it a poor wise man, and he by his wisdom delivered the city; yet no man remembered that same poor man."

We ask of you, O Reader, but one question: "What has been the whole sum of the profits of your business during the last twenty years?" One-tenth of this was not your own. It behooves you to ascertain what has become of this "Lord's portion" of goods. Take your pencil, for the angel uses a pen pointed with diamond: add the sum yourself, lest his figures surprise you in that day! Maybe, you are already penitent for the extravagance and selfishness and covetousness of your past life. If so, may the "depth of your poverty now abound to the riches of your liberality!" You have made a poor rich man hitherto, now, by God's blessing, become a rich poor man. Devise liberal things; venture "beyond (your) power," that, "by the experiment of this ministration," others may "glorify God for your professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ, and for your liberal distribution unto them, and unto all men." So shall God "multiply your seed sown, and increase the fruits of your righteousness."

We do not think that this systematic and intentional vice of robbing God is confined to our own church. On all sides the complaints are heard: Presbyterians, Baptists, and Episcopalians, present a united front here; as if the Almighty could be out-faced by numbers. Already that most terrible of all calamities threatens the country, a famine of the Divine Word. The spirit of God alone moves upon the hearts of young men to incline them to the work of the ministry, to lay before them the necessity of preaching the Gospel—sons born in the beauty of holiness from the womb of the morning. He gives that greatest gift, next to Son of God, prophets, apostles, pastors, and teachers; and He that gives can withhold. The few applicants to the Annual Conferences for admission, and the location of experienced, devoted Traveling Preachers, are, to our minds, symptoms the most alarming of the condition of the Church. How stern must be that necessity which can starve a Methodist preacher out of his mission! And how intense the poverty of a circuit that cannot afford one! The crumbs which fall from the children have hitherto supported the gospel—now even these are wanted.

In all these perplexities, O Man of God, despair not. Make full proof of thy ministry in hunger, in cold and nakedness, in fastings often, in journeyings often, in labors more abundant, in much patience, in necessities, in afflictions, in distresses; by pureness, by knowledge, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armor of righteousness; as sorrowful yet always rejoicing, as having nothing yet possessing all things. "Give no offense in anything."

As ye have this ministry, and have received mercy, faint not, for ye are the ambassadors of Christ.

THE SECRETARIES OF THE ANNUAL CONFERENCES are requested to forward certified statements of the votes on the questions of the Change of Name and Lay-Representation, to Dr. Summers to lay before the Bishops, at their meeting in Nashville, April 15.

THE INTERREGNUM.

The world turns round every twenty-four hours. We are prepared for any increase of speed—politically. The Mayor of this city has vetoed the arrangement for issuing more city money. Upon this increase of issue, the State depended for the means of moving its involved machinery. How the Supreme Judges are to be paid, the levees built, and the various offices of the Commonwealth supported, is a question. We really do not see the use of so much legislation and other work, when all depends upon a single will. How like the plays of children, are these present "make-believe" performances and functions of Aldermen, Attorneys, Judges, and Legislators! We suppose the really serious part of the matter is to be found in their pay, if any remains. We ought to reap the single advantage of a purely military situation, that is its economy. It costs a Republic a great deal to discuss what ought to be done, to compose jarring interests, to meet sectional wants, and by the resolution of forces, to derive a sound policy, and a wholesome disposition of public expenditures, and an equitable collection of necessary supplies. This can now all be determined by the Commander of the District, with little confusion, delay, or cost. Let the old politicians who have worn themselves out in the country's service, and the country, out in theirs, improve this interregnum, by reading Murphy's Tacitus, Smith's Thucydides, and Arnold's Rome. Let us all take a breathing spell. It is not quite certain when a general order for the registration of the qualified will be issued. We believe there will be interval enough to admit of a good deal of excellent reading and reflection. For instance, some eighty years gone, our Fathers began the great experiment of self-government. This is fact number one. At that day it was heralded as the birth of a new world, when the colonies achieved their independence upon Great Britain. We have grown up with an admiration for the wisdom of that history, and the men of that day. After the lapse of a brief period, in the life time of a nation, we have governed ourselves into a condition where twenty millions of people are moving at will, under the Executive guidance of a Congress, that makes law, and is the judge of its own law; and nine millions have lost all political rights acquired as Americans, by the Independence of seventy-six, and all before that inherited as Englishmen, from the time of King John: Magna Charta, Declaration of Independence, State Rights, everything, all gone. And that is fact number two.

Here is food for reflection. Never mind who is right or who wrong, here is the end of eighty years of experiment in the grand science of Government. The prospect is, that the great solvent of all human governments, steel and nitre, will presently dissolve the twenty million and the nine million into one fluid body, from which new political forms may crystallize. Given thirty millions of people, eighty years more, and every man a voter: then where will we be? What a blessed thing it is that there is a region where government proceeds without "manhood suffrage" or martial law. Is not that Heaven?

THE PRESIDENT ON FINANCE.

We publish to-day a remarkable report of a conversation had with President Johnson. He ought to know the real situation of the country, financially, for he is at the centre. His political instincts are, by long practice, quickened beyond those of most men. Those who have no U. S. Bonds can afford to read it to the end.

THE SOUTHERN CULTIVATOR.—The April number of this well known agricultural journal contains 48 pages—34 of reading matter, mostly original. It is embellished with a tasteful design and ground plan of a convenient dwelling—the first of a series. David Dickson, the most successful planter in Georgia, gives two communications, which, with over thirty other original articles, on topics pertaining to the Farm, Garden and Fireside—such as Cotton Culture, Manures, Grasses, Sorghum and other crops, Sheep, Implements—Grapes, Peaches, Vegetables—a letter from Gemes Munro, etc., etc., fully sustain the reputation of this valuable paper, which has been regularly issued for nearly twenty-five years.

THE HISTORY OF ONE FAMILY ALTAR.

Whoever reads the golden pages of the book of life, as the leaves are turned, day by day, by the fingers of time, will find but little occasion to pass on to the volumes of fiction. The scene of which we are going to speak, runs back to the summer of 1825. It was a lovely Sabbath—the services of the sanctuary were unusually impressive—the upturned faces and fixed attention told the prophet of the cross, that his message was being received as from God. At the close of the sermon, a man and his wife came forward, and gave themselves to God and the church. The final hymn was sung, the benediction was pronounced, and the people returned slowly and thoughtfully to their homes. The sun rode on in his chariot of fire, and finally disappeared behind the Western hills; the birds sang their evening hymn and went to sleep; the stars came out one after the other, until the high empyrean seemed an ocean of beauty. But there was a scene of far more interest in one of the cottages in that community. The father sat absorbed in thought, as he reviewed the events of the day—the most eventful day of his life. The mother had just sung her baby to sleep, with one of the sweet songs of Zion; and was now lost in meditation. For a time all was quiet, save the occasional heavy breathing that "disturbed the innocent sleep," or a sigh that told of the struggle that was going on in that maternal breast. Then a slight tremor passed over her delicate frame, and her heart seemed to stand still, as she turned and said: "My dear husband, I have been thinking, ever since we joined the church to-day, that this night we ought to erect a family altar in our house. I cannot bear the thought of our children growing up without it—and don't you think that now is the best time to take up this cross?" "I have been thinking," said the husband, "of the same thing; but I find one grave difficulty in my way." "Well, husband, I think I know what the difficulty is; and I have thought about it, too; but what if you can't read, that need not prevent us from discharging this duty; for I will read the lesson, if and by, he was put forward to open the meeting, and finally was appointed class-leader, which office he filled acceptably for many years. Their children grew up and called them blessed. Nine out of ten, who reached the years of maturity, embraced religion in early life. When that little baby, whom the mother sung to sleep on that memorable night, was fourteen years of age, he would conduct the family worship in his father's absence. He and two of his brothers became ministers of the gospel; while the other seven, all occupied good positions in the church. The second son, who seemed to be rather wild, joined a company, and went as a volunteer to the Mexican war; and their souls were filled with "sweet comfort and peace of a life in its earliest love." From that night the inmates of the household, at morn and eve around the family altar. The father having been educated in the German language, could not read the English; and hitherto had manifested but little desire for the subject; but now he felt the duty demanded that he should come acquainted with it. All spare moments were devoted to this work; and so rapidly did he improve, that it was not long before he could read well enough to conduct the entire service himself. The course of time, he made an improvement that he could aid the public prayer meeting; and you will pray." After a short silence the proposition was assented to; the chapter was read—they bowed together before God, and the priest of that household offered their evening sacrifice. No doubt the "thought was broken, and language lame," but the God mercy understood it all, for while prayed, God came in saving power at the close of the war, he settled Texas. But the wayward boy never forgotten by the loved ones at home, when they gathered around the old family altar, or bowed in secret prayer. For sixteen long years, he was presented at the mercy seat every day. Then came a breaking up of the family—the old homestead was deserted—the most of the family moved to the West—finally they pitched their tents, and erected their altar; the first night they bowed around it, the long absent boy, his wife and little ones bowed with them, and while they all wept and prayed, the wanderers were gathered into the fold of God. The next night there was another family altar erected to the God of mercy. J. M. BOLAND.

A Democratic Governor and three Democratic Congressmen have been elected in Connecticut.

For the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist. Nothing but Jesus.

"I have lived three-score years and more," said one of earth's most famed and gifted children to me, and yet every year has taught me more and more, that there is nothing but the love of my Saviour worth living for; and often have I cried like His servant of old, "Whom have I but Thee, when I doubt not that world looked on my life and thought it too bright to own a single care or sorrow."

If, then, God's most favored children realize the insufficiency of earthly good to satisfy the longings of their better nature, or lighten their crosses, how much more must the great multitudes, whose paths lie all through life in the valley of humility, be driven to this sure refuge in distress; the one unchanging friend, of whose sympathy and love we never despair. "Nothing but Jesus," and surely having this dear friend we need not fear what the world can do to us. It may smile or frown upon us; so He be near to sympathize with us, the coldness of all other hearts cannot utterly cast us down. Says St. Paul, when speaking of his accusation before the tyrant Nero at Rome, "All men forsook me notwithstanding the Lord stood with me and strengthened me. Ah! how often has he stood with his suffering children when forsaken of men; invisible indeed to the human eye, but oh how sensible has the broken heart realized His presence."

Some years since a young and lovely girl was called away from earth to Heaven, and seeing how eagerly she longed to be gone, her father remarked, "My darling, how can you bear to leave us, all you have always seemed to love us so much."

"Dear papa," she replied, "it seems to me, since I have caught a glimpse of my Saviour, I can think of nothing else. Oh! I do not love you less; I long to take you all with me; but for me, there is 'Nothing but Jesus'."

Not despising any earthly thing, nay, loving with purest, most selfless devotion those to whom we are bound by the strongest ties, but keeping Him throned in our hearts of hearts, high above every object of our affection, living and dying, let us cry, "None but Jesus!"

FROM OTHER CHURCHES.

EPISCOPAL.
AN IMPORTANT DOCUMENT—JOINT DECLARATION OF AMERICAN BISHOPS AGAINST RITUALISM.—It has for some time been announced that a large number of bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States would issue a joint declaration against the Ritualistic innovation. The declaration has now appeared, and we see from the names of the bishops appended, that not only all the well known Low-Church bishops have urged it, but also several who were heretofore regarded as High-Church men, as Bishop Cox, of Western New York.

After several preliminary items the declaration says:

"We hold in the language of the XXXIV. Article of Religion, that every particular or National Church, bath authority to ordain, change, and abolish Ceremonies or Rites of the Church, ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying; and also in the same language of the same article: that 'It is not necessary that Traditions and Ceremonies be in all places one, or utterly like; for at all times they have been divers, and may be changed according to the diversity of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's Word; and also, that this Church was duly organized as a particular and National Church in communion with the Universal or Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church of Christ, and that this organization which took place immediately after the American Revolution, was settled under the careful direction and advice, and with the cordial cooperation of godly, well learned, and justly venerated divines, who were well acquainted with the history of the Church of England before and since her blessed Reformation, and who thoroughly understood what was and is still required by the peculiarities of this country and its people."

"We hold, therefore, that the ceremonies, rites, and worship then established, ordained, and approved by common authority, as set forth in the book of common prayer of this church, which every bishop, presbyter, and deacon of the same has bound himself by subscription to the promise of conformity in article VII. of the Constitution, to obey, observe and follow; and that no strange or foreign usages should be introduced or sanctioned by the private judgment of any member or members of this Church, clerical or lay."

"We further hold, that while this Church is far from intending to depart from the Church of England in any essential point of doctrine, discipline, or worship, or further than local circumstances require, yet has its peculiar place, character, and duty as a particular and National Church; and that no prayerbook of the Church of England, in the reign of whatever sovereign set forth, and no laws of the Church of England have any force of law in this Church such as can be justly cited in defence of any departure from the express law of this Church, its liturgy, its discipline, rites, and usages."

"And we, therefore consider that in this particular National Church, any attempt to introduce into the public worship of Almighty God usages that have never been known, such as the use of incense, and the burning of lights in the order for the Holy Communion; recitation to the Holy Table or to the elements, such as indicate or imply that the sacrifice of our Divine Lord and Saviour, once offered, was of a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of the whole world; the adoption of clerical habits hitherto unknown, or material alterations of those which have been in use since the establishment of our episcopate, is an innovation which violates the discipline of the Church, and the authority of the magistrate, and wounds the consciences of the weak children."

"Furthermore, that we be not misunderstood, let it be noted that we include in these censures all declarations from the laws, rubrics, and settled order of this Church, as well by defect as by excess of observance, designing to maintain its integrity the sound scriptural and primitive, and therefore the catholic and apostolic spirit of the book of Common Prayer."

Signed by the following bishops: Bishop Smith, of Kentucky; Bishop Melville, of Ohio; Bishop Cooper, of Wisconsin; Bishop McKim, of Michigan; Bishop Leo, of Delaware; Bishop Johns, of Virginia; Bishop Eastburn, of Massachusetts; Bishop Chase, of New Hampshire; Bishop Upfold, of Indiana; Bishop Payne, of African Mission; Bishop Williams, of Connecticut; Bishop Davis, of South Carolina; Bishop Kip, of California; Bishop Lee, of Iowa; Bishop Clark, of Rhode Island; Bishop Gregg, of Texas; Assistant Bishop Bedell, of Ohio; Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota; Assistant Bishop Talbot, of Indiana; Bishop Wilmer, of Alabama; Bishop Vail, of Kansas; Bishop Cox, of Nebraska; Bishop Randall, of Colorado; Bishop Kerfoot, of Pittsburgh; Bishop Williams, China Mission; Assistant Bishop Cummins, Ky.; Assistant Bishop Armitage, of Wisconsin.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL VISITOR.—In many places in the country, Sunday-schools are suspended during the winter. In order to accommodate such schools, we propose to send them the Visitor for six months, at one-half the yearly rates. By this means every school throughout the Church may be supplied with this very popular paper.

A. H. REDFORD, Agent.

DISHOP KAVANAUGH.

This eminent divine of the M. E. Church, South preached in Santa Rosa on Sunday last, and every evening following till Thursday. The attendance was larger than we have ever known in this place, and the services unusually interesting. The sermons of the Bishop were powerful and eloquent expositions of the great truths of Christianity, abounding in sublime thoughts clothed in language of unequalled beauty, and appealing with tremendous force to the hearts and minds of his hearers. Several members were added to the church during the brief stay of the Bishop, and a general regret is expressed that it could not be prolonged. On Friday Bishop KAVANAUGH left for Windsor, to fill an appointment at Shiloh Church, where he will preach this evening and to-morrow morning. From thence he goes to Hardsburg. We trust that on returning the Bishop may be persuaded to tarry with us a few days longer, and thus give our citizens another opportunity of hearing him.—Sonoma Democrat.

Go on, Sir, go on!

Arago says, in his "Autobiography," that his master in mathematics was a word or two of advice, which he found in the binding of one of his text-books. Puzzled and discouraged by the difficulties he met with in his early studies, he was almost ready to give over the pursuit. Some words which he found on the waste-leaf used to stiffen the cover of his paper-bound text book caught his eye and interested him. "Impelled," he says, "by an indefinable curiosity, I dampened the cover of the book, and carefully unrolled the leaf to see what was on the other side. It proved to be a short letter from D'Alembert to a young person disheartened like myself by the difficulties of mathematical study, and who had written to him for counsel."

"Go on, Sir, go on," was the counsel which D'Alembert gave him. "The difficulties you meet will resolve themselves as you advance. Proceed, and light will dawn and shine with increased clearness on your path."

"That maxim," says Arago, "was my greatest master in mathematics." Following out these simple words, "go on, Sir, go on," made him the first astronomical mathematician of his age. What Christians it would make of us! What heroes of faith, what sages in holy wisdom, should we become, just by acting out that maxim, "Go on, Sir, go on."

ITALIAN LEGISLATION ON CHURCH PROPERTY.—The Italian Government is going from step to step in its encroachments on the authority of the Roman Catholic Church. What will come next we can not tell; but if it continues in its present course the Pope will soon have to excommunicate the whole kingdom of Italy and issue another allocation or two. Last month there was a bill brought forward in the Italian Parliament by the Ministers of Justice and Public Worship, and of Finance, for the liquidation of the ecclesiastical property in Italy. On the 28th of January the bill was distributed to the Deputies. The entire bill fills several closely-printed columns of a large newspaper. I will give you the spirit of it as declared by the whole by this specimen: "The Catholic Church is to be free from any special intervention in the State in the exercise of public worship. It can not take part in the internal arrangements of religious society. All privileges, immunities, and exemptions enjoyed by the Catholic Church are forever abolished."

These declarations are specified and intensified, and then come the articles authorizing the appropriation of a good slice of the Church property by the State.—New York Methodist.

MARRIED.

Married, March 14th, 1867, at the residence of the bride's father, by Rev. R. A. Timmons, Mr. ANDREW J. BURTON, of Chambers County, Ala., to Miss FANNIE E. PATTERSON, of Elmore county, Ala.

Married, March 21st, 1867, at the residence of the bride's father, by Rev. R. A. Timmons, Mr. E. F. WILLIAMS, to Miss LUCY A. KIRBY, all of Elmore county, Ala.

OBITUARIES.

Brother W. O. BARLETT, was born in Guilford county, April 4, 1790, where he resided until he was 28 years of age. Industry and economy formed an important part of his early education. His enterprising spirit sought a wider field of operation, than his native land afforded. This he found in the untamed wilderness of Louisiana, Ouachita Parish, in 1818, where he became a planter of respectable wealth, and has contributed largely to the agricultural and moral development of the great Southwest.

In 1830, he united with the M. E. Church, of which he continued to be a very consistent member. His house was the home of the preacher, and the sanctuary of God. Hoping to improve his failing health, he removed to Tangipahoe station, St. Helena Parish, La., in December, 1866, where he purchased a residence. His work was done. God gave him a better home—a home in Paradise. On the 25th of Jan., 1867, he died with ease, and in gracious peace, after an illness of three days.

I had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with Bro. Bartlett, and have had frequent opportunity of seeing, forcibly illustrated the principles of the religion he professed by his well ordered life, and Godly conversation. May his kind hearted wife, and dear children, follow his Godly example, and be kept by the power of God unto everlasting life.

J. ENGLISH.

Departed this life on the 15th inst., after a lingering and painful illness of eleven months, Mrs. MARIETTA H. REED, aged about 49 years. Sister R. was united in her second marriage, to the Rev. Lewis A. Reed, of the Louisiana Annual Conference, in January, 1862. She was religiously impressed from her earliest recollection, and joined the M. E. Church, when very young, and was shortly after converted, and never lost her identity with the church of her choice, almost unconsciously yielding to worldly cares, and influences, she neglected the means of grace, and lost the evidence of her acceptance, which she endeavored to regain, but did not secure to her satisfaction, until she was afflicted. With everything about her to make life happy, and with a heart which appreciated her blessings, she naturally loved life, and clung to it, as something she could not yet give up. For months, the fondest desire of her heart seemed to be that she might be raised to her feet once more.

But God's ways are not as our ways, and he chose to afflict her yet a little longer. About ten days before her death, she felt convinced that her end was not far distant, and then became reconciled to God. All nature appeared bright and beautiful; the light of God's countenance shone upon her once more, and she found "that joy in believing which passeth all understanding."

To those of her friends who were watching around her bedside, she remarked, that when she took her couch, God's face seemed hidden from her, and all was dark; but now, all was calm and peaceful, and she could pass through the vale of death, and find no evil, for God would be with her; His rod and His staff, would comfort her. Oh! who that saw that parting hour, could wish her back again upon this tainted earth? As her devoted husband, and loving friends, would gather around her dying couch, she would speak some kind word to each, and begged that all would meet her in that bright and happy land, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." She was so cheerful, so inspiring in her freshness, and there was such an exuberance of life, and joyfulness, radiating from her, that without herself suspecting it, she threw a kind of sunshine over the little circles with whom she had intercourse.

She was a bright ornament to society, and much loved and respected by all who knew her.

"But why should we mourn, or weep o'er the tomb Of a saint to her consort united, Far, far from this world of darkness and gloom, Where hope and fruition are blighted? Oh! No! let us rather rejoice she hath flown To the home of her God and her Saviour, To fill with the ransomed, a place at His throne And share in His glories forever."

A FRIEND.

March 23th, 1867.
Died, March 22nd, at the residence of her son-in-law, John G. Guice, in Franklin county, Miss., Sister LYDIA KINNISON, consort of Nathaniel Kinnison, deceased, of Jefferson county, Miss., born the 15th day of Oct., A. D. 1800, aged 66 years five months and seven days. She lived in Jefferson county, Miss., forty-five years. She joined the M. E. Church, in 1837, and for thirty years, sister Kinnison had lived an exemplary member of the church; she enjoyed much of the spirit and power of religion, though she was not a noisy Christian, and had not the advantage of a religious companion, but her long and devoted life was a continued evidence of the truth and spirituality of religion. Known and read of all who knew her, she had the satisfaction to live to see all her children, once members of the church, and we trust they will all meet her in heaven. Though she had a protracted illness, and suffered much yet, she bore her afflictions with Christian fortitude, and when she came to press a dying pillow, death having lost its lesson, she was calm, conscious, and resigned. She frequently talked of death, and said in her last moments, that she was perfectly resigned, and waiting the will of the Lord. She has left a large family to mourn her loss. She is gone, but we need not sorrow as those who have no hope.

JOHN G. GUICE.

In the quiet, rural village of Richland, Holmes county, Miss., on the 3rd day of December, 1866, MRS. LOUISA WALTON, wife of the late Rev. James Walton, of the Mississippi Conference, died suddenly of heart disease. The silent mission of a holy life, is the most magnificent and impressive thing under the whole canopy of God. To record it with the pen, one stands in awe, knowing he must always mar its beauty and come short of its excellence. It is God's hand-writing on the heart, the manifestation of his grace in life, hallowed to all the sentiments that are sacred and solemn in our natures. Such was the sublime spectacle and mission of the life of sister Walton. She was the daughter of Wm. and Rosannah Lunkin, born in Washington county, Tenn., March 31, 1803.

In 1823, she was converted to Christ and His religion. In 1824, she became the wife of Rev. James Walton. It rarely falls to the lot of friendship to record the death of a wiser and better woman, or becomes the sad duty of affection, to mourn the lot of so kind a mother, or the church of God, so worthy an example of faith, and unostentatious piety. In every life there is some central trait that determines, and intuitively to the judgment of all men, falsifies up the character to which it belongs. In the life and character of sister Walton, goodness combined with great practical energy, gave expression to her character, and value to her life, in the duties of home and the church. I know of no Christian, in whom all the elements of vital, and valuable religion, were more happily blended. Her religion was neither partial nor deformed. It had heart and hand, and eye and feet. There is a piety of sentiment that lives and worships God alone in forms of thought. And then there is a devotional piety serving God only, with fastings and prayers, but has no active goodness, weaving its song of thanksgiving in the toils of daily life. And then there is a piety of sensation, that, "anon with joy, receiveth the word, and which dureth for a while," but, which loses its tribute with its emotions. The full orb of piety of this meek and quiet woman, when put in contrast with these forms of piety, shows to the church the worthlessness of all powers of religion, unless they happily bleed in life, and manifest to the world, that there is a beauty, power, and reality in the religion of Jesus, which lends both, happiness to the life, and value to the character of all who may profess it.

It is in moderation, to say that all these forms of piety shone in her life. Sister Walton, though a noiseless Christian, was a woman of great religious sensibility. The rapture of her religious joys never assumed the power of verbal and noisy praise. Her joys were silent in their praise, they started from the perfection of her character, rather than from the idiosyncrasies of the natural man. As the most perfect character is the one that is most keenly alive to all that is ineffable in the character of God, and sublime in practical beauties of religion, manifests its sensibility by the power they exert over the life, so her religious sensibility assumed always the bonds, and walk in the duties of holy living. Such were some of the traits of this quiet Christian. As she has sown to the spirit, she reaps the life everlasting. Quietly she passed away. May the sweet influences of her life cease not in the earth, till they mingle with the knell of the judgment trumpet.

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

PICTURES.

Faces of childhood, fresh and sunny, Lying on the grass, and under the Willow, the birch, the willow,
And the meadows gay,
With the white and crimson clover,
Where the honey bee,
In the sunshine hovered over,
Beautiful to see.

Scowly looks upon the hillside,
Calves in pastures green;
In the tinted sheen;
All the golden wheat over
To the cottage door;
When the golden beams of morning
Trilled across the floor.

Books that broke the dreamy silence
With their silver song,
Reclining over abiding pebbles Fleeting ways along;
Sparkling waters off reflecting Feet and ankles bare,
Waiting over the pebbly bottom,
With a dainty care.

For, beyond, the greenest mosses,
In the shadows grew;
Tresses in the dim old pinewood
None but children knew,
And we wandered there, half fearful,
In the solemn shade,
Listening to the wondrous music
That the pine harp made.

And there were, that, to our fancy,
Gilded all the world;
Sound which from the sunset lingered
And the clouds fretted curled;
And that, to the childish vision,
Touched the sapphire sky;
All so near the bending heaven,
Childland seemed to lie.

Many morns and shifty noon times,
Sunset's silent, golden glow,
Summer's balmy, jeweled evenings,
Now, as ever, come and go;
But the pictures of my childhood
Fastest always seem to me,
Changing in the halls of memory,
Ever fresh and sweet to see.

And I pity all the children
Scolded in the city street,
With no green and flowery pathways
For the little restless feet;
They can never see my pictures
Summer thro' the after years, Beside and behind me even
When we see them thro' our tears.

Little Corporal,
When the clouds are blackest
With the April rain,
Comes the robin, singing,
To his home again.

God Made Everything.
Can you think of anything that God didn't make? I asked the little fellows in my Sunday school.
"Yes'm," said Robbie, promptly;
"And what makes you think He didn't make oysters, Robbie?"
"O, because—because—why, I should think most anybody could make an oyster."

Maybe some of the rest of you little folks think just as Robbie did—that an oyster is nothing but a soft, helpless, pulpy thing without head or feet, or any particular shape, shut up in a rough, ugly shell, the most helpless, ungainly thing in the world. But you are very much mistaken. God showed just as much love and wisdom in making the oyster, as He did in making the beautiful bird that sings in the tree tops. His home was down under the salt water, and his food was brought by the constant motion of the waves, not into his mouth, but into his stomach. He had no need of eyes to watch, or of hands to take, or of lungs to breathe;
the great salt bath did it all for him.
He was to live only near shore, and in shallow water, so he had no need of feet or fins to help him in his travels. But his delicate tissues needed the most careful protection, and so he was provided with a shell—ugly, rough, and hard without, smooth, glistening, and pearly within. A wonderful house, that no tempest can sweep from the rock where it grows; but this limp, little inhabitant can open the doors wide when he pleases, and shut them so fast that no man's fingers can open them. You must put in a wedge and break the lock first, and then they fly open. Every creature which God has made is exactly fitted for the place where He meant it to live; and the more we examine His works, the more we shall be filled with wonder at His wisdom and skill.

—Little Corporal.

This is the opening month—April, for April, from aperire, to open—and it is well named; for what a drawing of icy bolts there is beneath our feet this month! At every step we tread upon a thousand opening cracks, each one only large enough to let in the hundredth part of a water; but they all together —Spring. Truly the earth is a mighty effort in little things when it opens after this fashion.
How like its Maker, our God, who accomplishes his vast purposes by the infinite minuteness of his particular providence!

The earth opens its doors to receive and to give; to receive seed and give fruit. What a striving after fruit-bearing begins now!
You see it not in the favored plants alone, chosen by man for fruitage, but in the outcasts of the field and pasture, trampled on, gnawed down, dug up, scorched with fire, buried with earth, how they toil to bring forth fruit while the earth remains open!

Yes: April has a lesson for these frozen, barren hearts, that are not half so sensitive to the rays of Divine love as the crust of the earth is to the melting and opening sun.

The Young Count.
BY ROSA PALMER.

Listen, dear children, and I will tell you a story of a little German boy. In one of the chambers of a great house in Saxony, he sits writing a letter. He is not yet ten years old; but his face is glowing with busy thought. What can he be writing about, and to whom will he direct the letter that he pens with such careful fingers, stopping over every little while to think again before adding another word? It is all finished now, and the young writer has signed his name—LUD-WIG. Then, after folding the paper, he writes upon the outside the name of Jesus Christ!

A letter to Jesus Christ! and what will the boy do with it? See, he goes to the open window, looks up to the blue sky, and with a trusting smile drops the letter, and at last rests upon the green grass.
Then he stands waiting, with a wishful, patient look. He hopes the Saviour may some time find his letter and answer it. You will think this little Ludwig did not know much about his Saviour and yours. But he showed a desire to know more. Let me tell you how that desire was gratified, how his childish letter was at last answered.

One day, while still a boy, he visited a gallery of paintings, where he saw one of Jesus, as we see him in the twenty-seventh chapter of Matthew, on the cross, bruised and wounded for our transgressions, bleeding from those stripes by which we are healed, and pale with agony, yet having in his face a look of infinite love. Beneath the picture were these words: "Behold what I have done for you! And you! what have you done for me?" This picture and these words were not forgotten by the young Count of Zinzendorf. While in college, and busy with the studies of his course, he applied himself without any direction or aid to the study of theology also, fully resolved to become a minister of the gospel. And such he was for many years—minister, missionary, and reformer. After laboring successfully for Christ in Europe, he spent two years in this country, teaching the Indians in a part of Pennsylvania that was then a wilderness. Before he died, his pupils and followers had established Christian homes and churches among "Greenland's icy mountains," and earned for the Moravians the praise and sympathy of all other Christian workers. Now, when you think of Zinzendorf and his glorious life, remember the picture and the question that gave to his life its first great impulse. What have you done for the Saviour? Be sure he has a work for you. That is one reason why he calls you to him.
Let your daily prayer hereafter be,
Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?

None Other Name.
A few persons were collected round a blind man, who had taken his station on a bridge over a London canal, and was reading from an embossed Bible. Receiving from the passers-by of their carnal things, he was ministering to them spiritual things.

A gentleman on his way home from the city, was led by curiosity to the outskirts of the crowd. Just then the poor man, who was reading in the fourth chapter of the Acts, lost his place, and while trying to find it with his finger, kept repeating the last clause he had read; "None other name—none other name—
none other name."

Some of the people smiled at the blind man's embarrassment; but the gentleman went away deeply mu-singing. He had lately become convinced that he was a sinner, and had been trying, in many ways to obtain peace of mind. But religious exercises, good resolutions, altered habits, all were ineffectual to relieve his conscience of its load, and enable him to rejoice in God. The words he had heard from the blind man, however, rang their solemn music in his soul: "None other name!" When he reached his home and retired to rest, these words, like evening chime from village tower nestling among the trees, were still heard: "None other name, none other name—none other name!" And when he awoke, in more joyful measure, like matin bells saluting the morn, the strain continued: "None other name—none
other name—none other name!"
The music entered his soul, and he awoke to a new life. "I see it all! I see it all! I have been trying to be saved by my own works, my repentance, my prayers, my reformation. I see my mistake. It is Jesus who alone can save. To him
I will look. Neither is there salvation in any other. For there is none other name—none other name—none other name—under heaven given among men whereby they may be saved."

SCIENTIFIC.

Small Motive-Power.

The want of a small motive-power is an almost universal one—a power ranging from that of less than one horse to a minimum up to a maximum of about twelve horses.

At the present time this power is supplied chiefly by the numerous class of small portable steam engines, but to these there are many and serious objections as a motive-power for the mill. The first objection to the use of the steam engine is that it requires a certain amount of skill to manage it and careful attention, and that the labor involved in keeping it running is frequently otherwise wanted to assist in the work being performed.

The first cost of the engine is not so very great as to be a hindrance to its universal adoption over all other motive-powers, if it was not for the care it requires. It must be carefully housed and kept clean and free from rust, the necessary pipes and adjuncts must be carefully scrutinized to see that they are ready to perform their appointed portion of duty in the working of the engine;
the feed of the boiler must be closely attended to, or a serious result will be the finale of some day's operations; and then, again, where the power is wanted only at intervals, as upon the farm, the boiler would be soon rusted by the attendant, not having the time and care to bestow upon it that an engineer in constant attendance is supposed to bestow upon his boiler and engine. For the farmer's use an engine would be wanted in operation only at intervals, and those intervals often occur in the winter season, when water-pipes and water-reservoirs would be very often frozen. For many household purposes, also, as washing, steaming, and churning, the engine would be required, and its presence near the kitchen would be necessary. At one part of the farm power is needed to cut the fodder, hay, and vegetables, grind the corn and grain to feed the farm animals; and at another it is needed to saw the wood, thresh and clean the grain, and perform much mechanical work that the farmer might do to good advantage and profit if he only had the motive-power to do it with. For the supply of a small motive-power wanted near the kitchen, the dog and sheep have been very successfully employed, but neither of them is fully adequate to the occasion.

A motive-power operated by weights has proved of no great utility, and has been abandoned. The windmill has been tried, and it has, in its turn, tried the patience of those that depended on the wind to "turn for them." The wind-mill has so far proved itself as "fickle as the wind," and has fallen into bad repute as a ready power to be used when wanted. The horse-power seems to be the only available and economical power that at present can be used for farm purposes, but where more than one or two horse power is wanted, then come the objections; extra horses must be obtained, and perhaps they are hired at a great expense and at a cost much exceeding that of running an engine of a power many times that of the horse employed. The great recommendation of the horse-power is that it is available at any moment if the owner has a horse to use for it. The horse-power seems, at the present time, to be the only resource of the farmer for a motor.

The calorific engine is a safe and ready means of producing power, and has none of the attendant dangers of the steam-power. It requires no care of pipes and water-feeding that steam does, and it seems peculiarly fitted to fill a place in the farm economy, and the only drawbacks to its universal adoption are its cost and the limit of its power when its weight is considered—a four-horse Ericson engine weighing over four thousand pounds, and a mass of that weight cannot be readily moved about to the different places where it is wanted to be operated upon the farm.

In towns and cities where a hydraulic pressure is available, as in the water-works that supply the daily consumption of water, a number of small water-motive engines have been introduced, and are reported to operate with good economy, affording an instant and a ready means of producing power.
The mechanic who uses them feels no dependence upon others for his motive force; he has no fears of explosions for it has no boiler; and it has no furnace to produce a dust in his room. With the water engine he turns the water-cock, his wheels rotate; and when his work is finished, simply turning the cock back into its first position checks the power, and it is stored up for use upon the instant. Gas engines and electric motors have been made to operate quite successfully in some places; but they are not available to all, and can be used with profit in but few situations. The want of a cheap and effective motor is severely felt, and will at some future time be supplied—a motor that will be within the reach of all who want it, adapted alike to the mechanic and the farming interest, to manufacture, and to assist in the household economy.

Much has been done to produce this necessary motor, but the "thing needful" is yet to be produced—is yet in the future, and will be developed in its time.—*New

Every Man his own Measure-Maker.

The following rules, by which every one who can saw and nail boards, can make his own measures we find in an eastern paper:

A barrel contains 10,752 cubic inches. A box 24 inches long by 16 inches wide and 28 inches deep, that is, on the inside—will hold just a barrel.

Half-barrel. Make a box for this,
24 inches by 16, and 14 inches deep. This will contain 5,376 cubic inches, or just half a barrel.

A bushel contains 2,150 4-10 cubic inches. A bushel box will be 16 inches by 16 8-10 inches square, and 8 inches deep.

Half-bushel. A box twelve inches long by 11 1-10 inches wide and 8 inches deep, will hold half a bushel.

Peck. A box 8 inches by 8 4-10 inches square, and 8 inches deep, contains a peck.

Half-peck. A box 8 by 8 inches square, and 4 1-10 inches deep, or 268 cubic inches.

Half-gallon. In this there are 134 4-10 cubic inches. A box 7 by 4 inches and 4 8-10 inches deep, contains just that quantity.

Quart. A box 4 by 4 inches square, and 4 2-10 inches deep.—

A NEW SOUTHERN STAPLE.

A new plant has been added to the resources of our tropical and semi-tropical regions—a new textile which will furnish the world with clothing and the means of knowledge. We have seen, within a few days, long skeins of a cotton-like fibre, cotton-like in whiteness, softness and fineness, but much stronger, which is now produced at the rate of five crops per year, in the State of Veracruz, Mexico, where it has been cultivated for five years by a Belgian naturalist and botanist, who went there to pursue his favorite studies and occupations, in a soil and climate which favors them.

This plant, called the ramie, is a native of Java, was introduced thence into the Jardin des Plantes, at Paris, by some French savan, in 1844; was regarded then as simply exhibiting the wonderful advantages of the tropics, being too delicate for open air culture in cold climates.
But having been planted and tried in warmer climates than that of France, yet not so equatorial as that of Java, it has been found to do as well in them.

It is due to M. Benito Roez, formerly Chief of the Horticultural Institute of Belgium, now of Santo-domingo, San Andres Tuxtla State of Veracruz, Mexico, that we can now pronounce it a naturalized plant of this continent, and to his present visit to this city will speedily owe its introduction into the field culture of the Gulf States to which it will permanently pertain.

The ramie (its Javanese name) is a plant like hemp, contains in its stalk the fibre for which it is raised and which is grown like the sugarcane, from being planted in lengths or from its stubble; with this advantage over the stubble of the cane, that each succeeding year it grows better and that in Cuba and Lower Mexico it will furnish five, and here at least three cuttings in the year.

By a new process and some simple machinery invented by Mr. R., the lint can be prepared from the stalks, taken fresh from the ground in twenty-four hours. We all know that months of labor and the entire discoloring of the fibre follows the treatment by the ordinary process of flax and hemp, while the ramie comes out white, clean, pure and unhurt.

Eight hundred pounds of lint to the acre is to be expected from each cutting of full growth, in fair land.
The culture is similar to that of cane; but as the plant, when once set, is hard to eradicate, grows vigorously, and defies the influence of grass or rival plants, cultivation is only needed to promote its growth.
When ripe, it should be cut; but neglect to do this causes no special damage, so that it may wait days or weeks the will of the free republicans of Mexico and the Union. The fibre is long, fine and strong; the plant easy to raise, and hardy in a southern latitude; its preparation for market is simple and cheap in cost. Under those circumstances, we may safely pronounce that it will at an early day take high rank among our staples.—Pineyune.

Lutheran and Brethren churches, and all 33rd parallel of North latitude.

What is the object of the Society? To prepare and supply (gratis) where needed) the translation of the Holy Scriptures.

What are the resources and whence the funds of the Society? From the annual contributions of its members. Other funds of Church societies within its field, collections at public meetings and anniversaries. Appropriations of generous individuals, testamentary bequests to the annual donation in Books of the American Bible Society.

What is the Society's method of work? It cultivates its own local work in its city and district of New Orleans; then through its Societies established or to be established every Parish and County in the field, and it accomplishes the object of the Society.

Society as the Lord has prospered them according to Scripture which says: "Lay not up treasure on earth, where moth and rust corrupt, and where thieves dig up and steal; but lay up treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor thieves do corrupt, and where thieves do not

NEW SOUTHERN MUSIC BOOK.

Just published.

TABOR.

Or the Richmond Collection of Sacred Music by R. MCINTOSH, of Virginia.

The attention of Choirs and Musical Societies generally is respectfully asked for this new popular collection of Church Music. Its author, for four years an officer in the Confederate army, composed many pieces in moments snatched from the hurried march of war. It is a dirge at the funeral of a nation, and a wail of the future. It is a work of his pen, and it is a work of his heart.

Says the Richmond Whig: "The writer is known throughout the South as an author of excellence; a musical reputation was attained—at the time of the war

LATEST FASHIONS.
Call for
J. W. BRADLEY'S
DUPLEX ELLIPTICAL
[Or, Double Spring]
SKIRT!

THEY WILL NOT BEND OR BREAK
Like the Single Spring, but will preserve their perfect and graceful shape when three or four ordinary Skirts are thrown inside no useless—
each are the CHEAPEST.

Each Hoop is made by braiding two springs together, edge to edge, forming the STRONGEST, MOST FLEXIBLE, and still the LIGHTEST Hoop made.

In fact, for promenade, or the house, or the church, the theatre, or for crowded assemblies, railroad cars, carriages, etc., they are superior to all others, affording COMFORT TO THE WEARER, with that ELEGANCE OF SHAPE which was favor with all, and has made the "DUPLEX ELLIPTIC"

The Standard Skirt of the Fashionable World.
For misses and young ladies they are superior to all others.

For Sale Everywhere.
Manufactured exclusively by the owners of the Patent,
WESTS, BRADLEY & CARY,
87 Chambers, 79 and 81 Reade sts, New York.

CAUTION.
The Duplex Skirt will admit a pin being run through the center of each hoop, thereby proving there are TWO SPRINGS braided together, which is the secret of their remarkable STRENGTH and FLEXIBILITY—a combination not possessed by any SINGLE-SPRING Skirt.

The red ink stamp, viz: "J. W. BRADLEY'S Duplex Elliptic Springs" will be found upon the waistband of every Skirt; none other are genuine.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, VA.
IN FULL OPERATION.
THIS TIME HONORED INSTITUTION is one more in successful operation, with a FULL CORPS OF PROFESSORS. The chairs of the several schools are filled by able and experienced men. The college has a fine library and scientific apparatus, viz: OF ANCIENT LANGUAGES, CHEMISTRY AND NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, MORAL PHILOSOPHY AND MODERN LANGUAGES. In addition to the above the Board of Trustees have established a school of COMMERCE, with the view of giving to the young men of the country a BUSINESS EDUCATION.

To graduates in all these schools, Diplomas are granted and the degrees of Bachelor of Arts and Master of Arts are conferred upon students who accomplish a certain course. The high grade of scholarship formerly required is still maintained. We have full CHEMICAL and PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS for the illustration of the subjects taught.

The location of the College is unsurpassed for health and geniality. It is situated midway between the mountains and the seashore, and with thousands of young men in attendance, there has never been a death arising from malaria or any other malarial cause. We profess to educate young men not only mentally but physically also.

BOARD SIXTEEN DOLLARS PER MONTH. Tuition from $40 to $60, according to the number of schools attended. $250 will cover expenses of board, tuition, for three schools, transportation and contingent fees for ten months. Pupils in the college free of charge, but the student provides his own furniture, fuel and lights. Young men who are preparing for the military must those disabled by the late war who are unable to pay their tuition, will be allowed to attend any or all of the schools free of charge.

This College is situated near Dayton, the county seat of Meigs county, Va. Arrangements are made to transport students from Blagway Depot, on the Raleigh and Weldon Railroad, whilst a conveyance leaves Roanoke station, on the Richmond and Danville Railroad, on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, and the W. & P. Trip Depot, on the same road, on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

We solicit a liberal patronage from Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina, from the West, South and South-west.

Students will be received at any time. The second term will commence on the 6th day of February next. Young men will be received and prepared for the College proper. For further particulars address the undersigned at Dayton, Meigsburg county, Va.
